Of volume vast, but him: wide circulating;
Thou holy, high, transfated Legal Tender,
Approach, come nigher; soldining acquience,
For lo, the writing swell-mob of the Press
Would fain go through thee.
And I, a youth, bald, honest, simple, gusning.
Of roor but honest parents born—not flush though born in Flushing.

Am here to interview thee.

Tell us thy lineage as I've told thee mine—We have one end already of thy aqueous Line
Thy sire,
Cogsia,
(Thou canst not read that rhyme withouten ire)
But tell us of thy dam,
A most transporent, permeable sham.
In all tradition linked with wee and slaughter.
Thou well mights be a con, a silver,
An offspring of the bad dam of Mill River.
But no.
Yet tell rs, Comet, apropos
Of water—thou'rt considered cross and crabbed—
Ere thou com's nearer, tell us, art thou rabid?
Has Strias bit thee?

Middletown, Conn., has a patient and painstaking young woman who undertook to collect a million pottage stamps in two years—just as a good many other sweet sillinesses have. But this young woman wasn't so easily choked off as the rest, and now she has 900,000 stamps and three months left in which to get the balance. Meanwhile her friends have been chaffing her and have promised all sorts of fine presents if she succeeded. And the prospect is that she will come in for lots of new dresses, jewelry, ponies, phaetons ed id omne genus. Thus is virtue rewarded.

This is the way the recent interview between Toombs and President Grant is described by some free and easy newspaper man: "They went in at a particularly busy time, but Grant said he'd see such a visitor at once. When they entered Toombs frankly allowed, 'I am not a citizen of this country, General Grant, but being in town, I have called to pay my respects to you as the ruler of this nation.' 'Oh, never mind about that, General Toombs,' answered Grant, 'sit down. I am glad to see you at last, for I hunted very unangeessfully for you during the war.' The interview lasted nearly two hours, and was characterized by the greatest jollity imaginable."
