THE WEED IN THE WHEAT.

There never was such a funeral in the town of Jefferson as that of John Thomas Galley, LL D. He was buried with all the honors which a Christian people could show to one of the most eminent laymen in the sect to which he belonged. The clergymen of every Protestant denomination went to the funeral in a body, charitable or ganizations throughout the State sent resolutions of sympathy, learned men and scientific bodies in this feochafty and in Europe noted his feet was in church government, in the monary men in which this sincere and sealous man had not been a leader, whether it was in church government, in the monary in the monargement of papers, criminals, and the serve whether the was in church government, in the monargement of papers, criminals, and the serve whether it was in church government, in the management of papers, criminals, and the serve of have lost a friend to-day who will not soon be replaced."

the cause of religion; and besides,, the young clergyman felt certain natural exhibaration in the consciousness that all these dazzling virtues had belonged o one of his own flock.

It was a gray, murky day, and a he led the procession to the grave, he rebuked himself sharply that his feelings were not also depressed. In his secret soul, while he was pronouncing the eulogy on his chief helper, he had remembered the countless little traits which had made him one of the most disagreeable of men. De mortuis, he reminded himself again and again. What would have become of prison

There was a profound silence.
Neither man looked at the other. As they passed the church which old Fowler, the sexton, was closing, they both paused involuntarily. There was nobody now to forbid the alterations which they both had been urging for two years. A square tower of gray stone—now? The tower was in both their minds, but they did not say a word.

"Tut! tut! It is no time to talk of that, Fowler," said Mr. Mansill, sharply.
"That's true. In the midst of life we are in death," the sexton replied with a groan, which he felt to be proper to the occasion. But the old man went home to his dinner with a good appetite; indeed, he bought some tarts on the way, making quite a feast of himself and his women folks. The death of such a great man was a sort of holy day, and, besides, there would be nobody now to nag and bully him, perpetually, about the heat in the church and the sweeping and the coal bills. "A man come to my age," he said to his wife, "don't like to be watched as if he'd be a thief soon's he was left alone."

There was a row of three ponderous buildings—the Galley Orphan Asylum, the Galley Hospital, the Galley Dispensary—facing him. Lights were gleaming in them all. Dr. Finlay entered, and passed through the wards and halls where his face was familiar.

"So the old man is gone?" said one of the patients. "Did he leave any money to keep up the hospital? Ah, that's good!" with a satisfied nod. The matron of the asylum followed him out. "Now, I can bring back that nurse, Dr. Finlay? It was only Dr. Galley's prejudice."

"Another time—another time," cleaded the clergyman. This forget-tulness and ingratitude seemed to him indecent and cruel. He took up on his knee one of the little orphan children whom the old man's money had secured from want, and perhaps or the said to his with the went in the condition of the properture of the p

"It was a little fault, after all," said the old minister, rising with a said face and lighting his bedroom candle. "He had the spirits of a great reformer, and heroic courage." "He was a fond father and husband too," said the dead man's pastor, eagerly, glad to speak some word of
