Desperate Remedies

By Themas Hardy. AUTHOR OF "A PAIR OF BLUE EYES," "THE TRUMPET-MAJOR," ETC.

"It was now about three o'clock. He had advanced as far as the shrubbery, which grows near the north wall of the house, when he fancied he heard, above the rush of the waterfall, noises on the other ride of the building. He described them in these words, 'Ghostly mouths talking—then a fall—then a groan—then the rush of the water and creak of the engine as before.' Only one explanation occurred to him; the house was haunted. And, whether those of the living or the dead, voices of any kind were inimical to one who had come on such an errand. He steathilly crept home.

'His unlawful purpose in being behind the house led him to conceal his adventure. No suspicion of the truth entered his mind until the railway porter had startled everyody by his strange announcement. Then he asked himself, had the horrifying sounds of that night been really in the enactment in the flesh between me and my wife?

"The words of the other man were,
"Why don't he try and find out if she's

"The words of the other man were,
"'Why don't he try and find out if she's alive? "Arue," said the first. 'Well, I den't forget what I heard, and if she don't turn up alive my mind will be as sure as a Bible upon her murder, and the parson shall know it, though I do get six months on the treadmill for being where I was."

"And it she should turn up alive?"

"Then I shall know that I am wrong, and believing myself a fool as well as a rogue, hold my tongae."

"I glided out of the house in a cold sweet The only pressure in heaven or earth which could have me to renounce Cytherea was now put upon me—the dread of a death on the gallows.

"I sat all the night weaving strategy of

"I sat all the night weaving strategy of various kinds. The only effectual remedy for my hazardous standing that I could see was a simple one. It was to substitute another woman for my wife before the sus-picions of that one easily-hoodwinked man extended further.

"The only difficulty was to find a practical le substitute.

"The only woman at all available for the purpose was a friendless, innocent creature, named Anne Seaway, whom I had known in my youth, and who had for some time been the housekeeper of a lady in London. On account of this lady's sudden death. Anne stood in a rather purpose was a friendless, innocent creature, named Anne Seaway, whom I had known in my youth, and who had for some time been the housekeeper of a lady in London. On account of this lady's sudden death, Anne stood in a rather precarious. sudden death, Anne stood in a rather precarious position as regarded her subsistence. She was not the best kind of woman for the scheme; but there was no alternative. One quality of hers was valuable; she was not a talker. I went to London the very next day, called at the Hoxton lodging of my wife (the only place at which she had been called Mrs. Manston), and found that no great difficulties stood in the way of a personation. And thus favoring circumstances determined my course. I visited Anne Seaway, made love to her and propounded my plan.

"We lived quietly enough until the Sunday before my apprehension. Anne came home from church that morning, and told me of the suspicious way in which a young man had looked at her there. Nothing could be done beyond waiting the isaue of events. Then a letter came from Raunham. For the first time in my life I was half indifferent as to what fate awaited me.

ring the succeeding day I thought once or wice of running away, but could not quite make up my mind. At any rate it would be best to bury the body of my wife, I ought, for the oven might be opened at y time. I went to Troominster and made ne arrangements. In the evening Miss delyfic (who is united to me by a common wet which I have no right or wish to colose) came to my house, and alarmed is still more. She said she could tell by Raunham's manner that evening, that kept from her a suspicion of more imtance than the one he spoke of, and that angers were in his house even then.

"I guessed what this further suspicion is, and resolved to enlighten her to a rtain extent, and so secure her assistance.

THE LONDON ADVERTISER,

I said that I had killed my wife by an accident on the night of the fire, dwelling upon the advantage to her of the death of the only woman who knew her secret.

"Her terror, and fears for my fate, led her to watch the rectory that evening. She saw the detective leave it, and followed him to my residence. This she told me hurriedly told me when I perceived her after digging my wife's grave in the plantation. She did not suspect what the sack contained.

"I am now about to pass into my normal condition. For people are almost always in their graves. When we survey the long race of mer, it is strange and still more strange to find that they are mainly dead men, who have scarcely been otherwise.

"Æneas Manston."

The steward's confession, aided by circumstantial evidence of various kinds, was the means of freeing both Anne Seaway and Miss Aldelysse from all suspicion of complicity with the murderer.

2. Six o'clock, p.m.

It was evening—just at sunset—on the day of Manston's death.

In the little cottage at Palchurch was gathered a group consisting of Cytherea, her brother, Edward Springrove, and his father. They sat by the window conversing on the strange events which had just taken place. In Cytherea's eyes, there beamed a grateful ray, though her face was as white as a lify.

taken place. In Cytherea's eyes, there beamed a grateful ray, though her face was as white as a lily.

Whilst they talked, looking out at the yellow evening light that coated the hedges trees, and church tower, a brougham rolled round the corner of the lane, and came in full view. It reflected the rays of the sun in a flash from its polished panels as it turned the angle, the spokes of the wheels bristling in the same light like bayonets. The vehicle came nearer, and arrived opposite Owen's door, when the driver pulled the rein and gave a shout, and the panting and sweating horses stopped.

"Miss Aldelyfie's carriage," they all exclaimed.

Owen went court 447-448.

Owen went out. "Is Miss Graye at home?" said the man. "A note for her, and I am to wait for an answer."

Cytherea read in the handwriting of the rector of Carriford, rector of Carriford,

DEAR MISS GRAYE.

"Miss Aldclyffe is ill, though not dangerously. She continually repeats your name, and now wishes very much to see you. If you possibly can, come in the carriage.

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN RAUNHAM. "How comes she ill ?" Owen inquired of "How comes she ill?" Owen inquired of the coachman.

"She caught a violent cold by standing out of doors in the damp on the night the steward ran away. Ever since, till this morning, she complained of fullness and heat in the chest. This morning the maid ran in and told her that Manston had killed himself in jail—she shricked—broke a bloodvessel—and fell upon the floor. Severe internal hemorrhage continued for some time and then stopped. They say she's sure to get over it, but she herself says no. She has suffered it before.

Cytherea was ready in a few moments, and entered the carriage.

Seven o'clock, p.m.

Soft as was Cytherea's motion along the corridors of Knapwater House, and preternaturally, keen intelligence of the suffering woman caught the maiden's well-known footfall. She entered the sick chamber with suspended breath.

In the room everything was so still, and sensation was as it were so rarefied by solicitude, that thinking seemed acting, and the lady's weak act of trying to live a silent wrestling with all the powers of the universe. Nobody was present except Mr. a Raunham, the nurse having left the room on Cytherea's entry, and the physician and surgeon being engaged in a whispering conversation in a side-chamber. Their patient had been pronounce out of danger.

Cytherea went to the bedside, and was instantly recognized. Oh, what a change—Miss Aldelyfie dependent on pillows! And instantly recognized. Oh, what a change—Miss Aldelyfie dependent on pillows! "Cytherea," she faintly wispers the instant the door was closed.

Cytherea clasped the lady's weak hand, and sank beside her.
