CHAPTER XLVIII.

"GOOD ANGEL OF GOD."

The young nurse soon became known through the house simply as Miss Mildred. With the exception of Mrs. Sheppard, the valet, and the physician, no one entered the sick-room except Mr. Arnold, and the old man often lingered and hovered around like a remorseful ghost. He had grown like a remorseful ghost. He had grown valet, and the physician, no one catered the sick-room except Mr. Arnold, and the old man often lingered and hovered around like a remorseful ghost. rest as one might during a respite from torture. His eyes would follow wildred with a pathetic longing when he was awake, and when she took his hand and told him to sleep he would obey like a child. He seemed better because so quiet, but he grew weaker daily. All knew, and none better than himself, that life was slowly ebbing. His father came in more frequently than ever, for his son showed no restlessness at his presence now. At Mildred's request Vinton even be zan to greet him with something like a welcome, and the young girldid all in her power to make the old gentleman feel at home; sometimes she would place a large easy-chair by the fire and ask him to sit with them. He was glad to comply, and often looked wonderingly and earnestly at the fair young nurse that was working such a transformation in the patient. He once or twice tried to become better acquainted with her, but ever found her gentle, deferential, and very reserved.

Every day increased the bitter regret that short-sighted worldliness had blighted one life and kept from others one who had place a large easy-chair by the fire and ask him to sit with them. He was glad to comply, and often looked wonderingly and earnestly at the fair young nurse that was working such a transformation in the patie.

"Such words make me very sad," sh into her eyes. "I am not worthy that you should care much," he said. "What am I but a dickering rushlight which your hand is flickering rushlight which your hand is shielding that it may burn out quietly?"
"Vinton, you are wrong. The life which God has given you cannot cease. I am not wise and learned, and I have an almost unconquerable diffidence in speaking on these subjects, except to children and the poor and ignorant. But since you won't see any and ignorant. But since you won't see any one else, I must speak. You say God sent me to you, and I accept your belief, but He did not send me to you merely to relieve physical pain and mental disquiet. You are near—you are merciful and kind. This is all the and man's noblest act is to forgive a great wrong. Let me rest, Mildred. It will be but for a few more days. Then when you close my eyes may I sleep forever," and he leaned back faint and exhausted. He would not let her interrupt him, for he seemed bent on settling the question as far as he was concerned, and dismissing it finally.

She listened with fast-falling tears, and answered, sighingly, "Oh I do wish you would see Mr. Wentworth. You are so wrong—so fatally mistaken."

She never forgot his answering glance. "Millie," he said softly, "I can die happy now. I never expected more than your pity."

He was glad to comply, and often looked wonderingly and earnestly at the fair young nurse that was working such a transformation in the patient. He once or twice tried to become better acquainted with her, but ever found her gentle, deferential, and very reserved.

Twice Mildred asked Vinton to let her send for Mr. Wentworth, but he shook his head and said that she alone could do him head and said that she alone could do him any good. "Read the Bible to me when show evening as she was sitting should be such as the show his head and said that she alone could do him any good. There is a point in noble souls beyond which enmity falters and fails, and he felt that Mildred's course toward Arnold was like the mercy of God. He reverenced the girl who like an angel of mercy was bringing hope to a despairing soul.

"Laura," said old Mr. Arnold to Mrs. Sheppard one evening as she was sitting with him in his library, "this young nurse is a continual surprise to me."

"What do you mean, papa?"
"Well, she impresses me strangely. She has come to us as a professional nurse, and has come to us as a professional nurse, and yet I have never seen a more perfect gentle-woman. There is a subtle grace and refinement about her which is indescribable. No wonder Vinton has been made better by her care. I wouldn't mind being sick myself if I could have her about me. That girl has a history. How comes she in such a position?

"I think her position a very exalted one,"

"I think her position a very exalted one," said his daughter warmly. "Think what an infinite blessing and comfort she has been in our household."
"True, true enough; but I didn't expect any such person to be sent to us."
"I am perfectly ready to admit that this young girl is an unusual character, and have no doubt but that she has had a history that would account for her influence.
