

Europe were of no direct concern to Canada and that to offer financial assistance would be a waste of Canadian taxpayers' money. Thirty-one percent of respondents were of the opinion that Canada should offer financial assistance even if this meant an increase in taxes.

In the CITS 1989 poll, respondents were asked several questions on threats to world peace and the use of nuclear weapons. Asked which situation posed the greatest threat to world peace, 7 percent of Canadians surveyed identified Soviet actions on the international scene, 9 percent pointed to American actions, 41 percent cited the arms race between the superpowers, 57 percent said regional conflicts elsewhere in the world were the greatest threat and 40 percent said aggression by smaller powers was the greatest threat.

Four percent of survey respondents believed that nuclear war is very likely in the next ten years, 15 percent said it is likely, 56 percent considered it unlikely and 25 percent said it is very unlikely.

On the question of how nuclear arms might be used, 75 percent of respondents said they use by nuclear powers or a nuclear war, 10 percent of respondents also believed it likely that the United States or the Soviet Union would use nuclear weapons in a regional conflict. Nine percent of Canadians surveyed believed that a nuclear explosion following an accident or human error is very likely, 36 percent believed it is likely, 38 percent thought it unlikely and 17 percent considered it very unlikely.

In a Gallup poll of 1,021 respondents conducted in January 1990, 54 percent of Canadians believed that the Cold War has ended, while 39 percent held the opposite opinion. Seventeen percent had no opinion.

In May 1990, Durham News and Novost News Agency asked the Angus Reid firm to conduct simultaneous opinion surveys in Moscow, Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. Asked how they perceived the end of the Cold War, 51 percent of the 299 Canadians surveyed said they felt that it would be a good thing, 13 percent said it would be a bad thing, 13 percent said they would not know and 13 percent held the opposite opinion.

Respondents from a recent survey conducted in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, however, expressed more concern about the end of the Cold War. Asked how they perceived the end of the Cold War, 51 percent of the 299 Canadians surveyed said they felt that it would be a good thing, 13 percent said it would be a bad thing, 13 percent said they would not know and 13 percent held the opposite opinion.

In a Gallup poll of 1,021 respondents conducted in January 1990, 54 percent of Canadians believed that the Cold War has ended, while 39 percent held the opposite opinion. Seventeen percent had no opinion.

In May 1990, Durham News and Novost News Agency asked the Angus Reid firm to conduct simultaneous opinion surveys in Moscow, Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. Asked how they perceived the end of the Cold War, 51 percent of the 299 Canadians surveyed said they felt that it would be a good thing, 13 percent said it would be a bad thing, 13 percent said they would not know and 13 percent held the opposite opinion.

Respondents from a recent survey conducted in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, however, expressed more concern about the end of the Cold War. Asked how they perceived the end of the Cold War, 51 percent of the 299 Canadians surveyed said they felt that it would be a good thing, 13 percent said it would be a bad thing, 13 percent said they would not know and 13 percent held the opposite opinion.

In a Gallup poll of 1,021 respondents conducted in January 1990, 54 percent of Canadians believed that the Cold War has ended, while 39 percent held the opposite opinion. Seventeen percent had no opinion.

In May 1990, Durham News and Novost News Agency asked the Angus Reid firm to conduct simultaneous opinion surveys in Moscow, Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. Asked how they perceived the end of the Cold War, 51 percent of the 299 Canadians surveyed said they felt that it would be a good thing, 13 percent said it would be a bad thing, 13 percent said they would not know and 13 percent held the opposite opinion.

Respondents from a recent survey conducted in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, however, expressed more concern about the end of the Cold War. Asked how they perceived the end of the Cold War, 51 percent of the 299 Canadians surveyed said they felt that it would be a good thing, 13 percent said it would be a bad thing, 13 percent said they would not know and 13 percent held the opposite opinion.

In a Gallup poll of 1,021 respondents conducted in January 1990, 54 percent of Canadians believed that the Cold War has ended, while 39 percent held the opposite opinion. Seventeen percent had no opinion.

In May 1990, Durham News and Novost News Agency asked the Angus Reid firm to conduct simultaneous opinion surveys in Moscow, Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. Asked how they perceived the end of the Cold War, 51 percent of the 299 Canadians surveyed said they felt that it would be a good thing, 13 percent said it would be a bad thing, 13 percent said they would not know and 13 percent held the opposite opinion.

Respondents from a recent survey conducted in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, however, expressed more concern about the end of the Cold War. Asked how they perceived the end of the Cold War, 51 percent of the 299 Canadians surveyed said they felt that it would be a good thing, 13 percent said it would be a bad thing, 13 percent said they would not know and 13 percent held the opposite opinion.

In a Gallup poll of 1,021 respondents conducted in January 1990, 54 percent of Canadians believed that the Cold War has ended, while 39 percent held the opposite opinion. Seventeen percent had no opinion.

In May 1990, Durham News and Novost News Agency asked the Angus Reid firm to conduct simultaneous opinion surveys in Moscow, Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. Asked how they perceived the end of the Cold War, 51 percent of the 299 Canadians surveyed said they felt that it would be a good thing, 13 percent said it would be a bad thing, 13 percent said they would not know and 13 percent held the opposite opinion.

Respondents from a recent survey conducted in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, however, expressed more concern about the end of the Cold War. Asked how they perceived the end of the Cold War, 51 percent of the 299 Canadians surveyed said they felt that it would be a good thing, 13 percent said it would be a bad thing, 13 percent said they would not know and 13 percent held the opposite opinion.

In a Gallup poll of 1,021 respondents conducted in January 1990, 54 percent of Canadians believed that the Cold War has ended, while 39 percent held the opposite opinion. Seventeen percent had no opinion.

In May 1990, Durham News and Novost News Agency asked the Angus Reid firm to conduct simultaneous opinion surveys in Moscow, Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. Asked how they perceived the end of the Cold War, 51 percent of the 299 Canadians surveyed said they felt that it would be a good thing, 13 percent said it would be a bad thing, 13 percent said they would not know and 13 percent held the opposite opinion.

Respondents from a recent survey conducted in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, however, expressed more concern about the end of the Cold War. Asked how they perceived the end of the Cold War, 51 percent of the 299 Canadians surveyed said they felt that it would be a good thing, 13 percent said it would be a bad thing, 13 percent said they would not know and 13 percent held the opposite opinion.