MY HEART AND MY HUSBAND ADELE GARRISON'S NEW PHASE OF REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

Why Madge's Fears Changed To Happy Congratulations.

As the violins of the school orchestra showed unmistakable signs of approaching the end of the selection with which they were favoring us, Dicky lifted his head from my unfortunate pasted manuscript and let his eyes rove over the faces before him until he found mine. I have never seen him look handsomer. He was, indeed, a brilliant, imposing figure, was, indeed, a brilliant, imposing figure, guilty.

manuscript, understood the dismayed comprehension of its feminine phraseology which had come to me and was mischievously revelling in my consternation, was only too apparent to me. But I saw a turning of heads,

Me. But I saw a turning of heads, knew that pupils and teachers were watching Dicky's every glance and gesture, and I forced my lips to a gay little answering smile at him.

The next moment the orchestral music had ceased and Mr. Stockbridge, with an earnestness which I knew was born of his anguished envy of the soldier's chances denied his maimed body, was introducing Dicky to the pupils crowded before him. With a little sick feeling at my heart I saw that my husband held loosely in his hands the manuscript which had become anathema to me.

"May I also add my congratulations, Dicky?" I murmured shyly, holding out

A Brilliant Success.

But with his first words I gave a heartfelt sigh of relief and as he warmed to his subject I had hard work to keep back happy, grateful tears. For every word, from his first sentence to his last, was couched in snappy, crisp, masculine English with no pretense about it, but of such virility and such absorbing interest that his youthful auditors appeared literally to be accomplishing the hackneyed phrase, "hang-ling under hackneyed phrase," have unconsciously hustled her lines of pupils forth, had just entered the room.
