

wast mild and lovely," was with difficulty sung. And as the grave received the lifeless clay, we all felt that the Church had lost two of its most valued members, and the neighborhood two of its most worthy and saintliest characters.

This melancholy visitation has made a deep impression upon the public mind, and the hope is entertained that the influence wielded by them in life, will be increased by the circumstances connected with their death, and that all may be over-ruled for the good of souls and for the glory of God.
