ners of the cathedral. One of these—the one that faced towards the door of the church—was the one that had drawn the boy from his home. It is strange, you say, that such a thing, a mere marble angel, could have allured a boy of health and spirits from his noisy play. Yes, it is strange, but then this boy was enough to melt the heart even of a marble angel, but this one moved not. The boy was not discouraged, however, but repeated his request earnestly. Still the white face remained the same as ever, and the boy shut his eyes for a moment, wondering if when he opened them the blue eyes of the white angel

Then with something of a sob, the boy turned and stumbled down the steps that led to the street. He did not look back again.

Slowly the weeks drifted past but the boy did not return to the old cathedral.

The white angel had done its part It had brought love and sunshine to that lonely little heart, by taking it forever from where its happiness might be dimmed, had led it to the happy garden of sunshine and song where the Christ Child played.
