BETTER THAN HE KNEW.

When the famous Pere Didon was a child he was very fond of a certain dish which his mother prepared with especial skill. It consisted of codfish cutlets, cooked in olive oil, with a few onions to flavor it. Whenever the boy saw her getting ready to cook the dish he liked so well, his nostrils would dilate and he would stand on tiptoe in order to watch its progress in the frying pan. And, as he was a spoiled child, his elder sister, or an old aunt who lived in the family, would take up a small portion and, putting it on a plate with a piece of bread, would say: "Here, Henri, eat this, and be a good boy."

One day when this had occurred as usual, Henri, with his morsel of bread all ready, was about to dip it into the olive oil, in which his piece of fish swam deliciously, when an old beggar made his appearance, and, pausing in front of the child, said: "Will you kindly give me a bit of bread, little boy?"

Hardly had the request passed the beggar's lips when the wings of the boy's good angel began to flutter above his head. The child did not hesitate a moment.

"Here!" he said, handing the plate with the bread and fish to the beggar. "You are welcome."

The old man sat down beside him on the porch.

"But what will you have?" he asked, touched by some inward scruple which forbade him to deprive the child of his tidbit.

"Oh, I can manage!" replied Henri, carelessly.

Side by side they sat till the beggar had finished. Then the old man arose, held out the plate and said:

"Thank you. It was very good. And he walked slowly away.

A feeling of melancholy began to take possession of the heart of the child, predestined to be the friend of all humanity. It was his first realization of the disparity between comfort and discomfort, plenty and poverty. Full of strange, new thoughts, he sat alone in the twilight.

"Henri!" called a voice from within the house. "What are you doing? Not still eating, little glutton! Was the fish good?"

"Very good, indeed," answered the boy slowly. And it was good—better even than he knew.—Southern Churchman.
