INTELLECTUAL PROGRAMME.
"Jesus increased in wisdom . . ."
Luke 2:52.
"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy mind." Luke 19:27.
"To everyone there openeth,
The high way and the low;
The high soul climbs the high way,
And the low soul groups the low;
And in between on the misty flats,
The rest drift to and fro.
And to every one that openeth,
The high way and the low,
And every one decideth,
The way his soul shall go."

During the past few weeks we have been trying to give you a general outline of the Tuxis programme. We are now going to go a little deeper into this fourfold development. This week we shall deal with the intellectual side of the programme.
The mind is capable of wonderful development and youth is the time when large measure of this development must be accomplished. Through a well equipped mind we come to know ourselves better, to appreciate our fellow men more fully, to perceive more of God's truth and to understand something of the meaning and purpose of life.
Someone has said, "Wood-craft is the first of the sciences in point of time and should therefore come first in education." Certain it is that there is a great store of knowledge to be learned through wood-craft pursuits. Every Tuxis Boy is encouraged to become a lover of the out-of-doors, to learn the interesting and valuable lessons which may only be learned through a first hand contact with nature.
Our schools and colleges undoubtedly furnish the best and most complete training. It pays to stay at school, even at a real sacrifice, until one has secured the best possible training for the life work one expects to follow. Those who cannot possibly stay on at school should take advantage of the night courses offered by High Schools and Technical Institutes, short courses conducted by Agricultural Colleges and corresponding courses. The all-important thing is to lay a good foundation upon which a noble career may be built.
No fair student of the New Testament can fail to note the intellectual-ity of Jesus. He was broad-minded in every sense of the term. The range of His knowledge was great; the quality of it very rare. There was a certain remarkable universality about His grasp of truth and a penetrating keenness about His understanding that made it possible for Him to see clearly in the most perplexing situation and judge rightly in face of the crucial test questions set for Him by the shrewdest Scribes and lawyers of His day. His replies in debate were like rapier thrusts. He so disarmed His antagonists that finally they "durst ask him no more questions" seeking to entrap Him.
It is only as we use to the full our opportunities for formal education and interest ourselves in such supplementary features as wood-craft, public speaking, home reading, education, arts, crafts and hobbies that we may claim to be following fully the Great Master who, although not trained in the higher rabbinical schools, was more than a Master for the keenest and best trained minds of His day.

Lydia Crydman, widow of the late John Algure, was born near Cornwall in 1783, and married about the beginning of this century.
The honored and heroic mother of 11 children, nine of whom are yet living who were trained by her skill and labor, who in widowhood for more than 30 years performed the successful task of guiding her house. She was a woman of faith and prayer for many years, but at the great revival in which several of her children were converted, God revealed the joy of Gospel salvation in her purified heart. The writer administered the Sacrament of Baptism to her, with other aged converts to the faith at that time, and she united with the M. E. Church and closed a life honorable to herself as it had been useful to others, at the residence of her son, Sterling Algure, near Farmersville, Sep. 9th, 1867, aged 84 years, 4 months and 10 days, in the delightful hope of the Gospel.

The Return of John Simons and Wife
(Crawf. Slack.)
One evening as they were sitting together side by side, talking of by-gone pleasures when he became his bride; As places and friends were mentioned, he said in a pleading strain, "Let us go back to Farmersville and see the old friends again; We'll visit the dear old places that once we both loved so; And greet the friendly faces we knew in the long ago; When the love-bird used to sing, When together we strolled in the wildwood, plucked the flowers in spring."
"We are not pinched for money, we have plenty and some to spare, And as here the children are settled, perhaps we'll remain back there," then he said, "My good wife we shall go, Before our heads get any whiter, or our steps get more slow; I've been possessed of a longing, although I have hid it from you, To go back to the place of my boyhood, friends which I long ago knew."
They started at once to get ready, there was one happy woman that night, They next day they were busy as bees with hearts which were merry and light.
They decided they'd forward a letter of their coming that friends might prepare, Have them meet them out at the station and not take them unaware; After bidding good-bye to the children and their neighbors again and again, With hearts as light as two lovers, they started away on the train; They mingling and great expectation they came to the loved journey's end, Got off at the little way station, and to meet them there wasn't a friend; Upon making some close enquiries about people they used to know, They learned they had left the district or had died some years ago.
All things had changed completely, why they scarcely knew the place, Changed the streets, the church, the homestead, not an old familiar face; Ruthless hands had felled the elms where the robins used to sing; Gone the tree-arched lane and wildwood where they gathered flowers in spring; They visited the cemetery, which they found much the same, And there read on the monuments in sorrow many a name, Then turning away in sadness from the graves where their loved ones rest, They bid farewell to the village and returned to their home in the west.
Youth has its disappointments and the cure is sometimes tears, Disappointments are more fatal when they smite in after years.

John Simons and wife, Lucinda, lived long back in Farmersville, As children they attended the red school house on the hill; There they learned to love each other, were wedded their one May, 'Twas there their children, one and all, first saw the light of day, At the village church in union they worshipped year by year, With brother, sister, neighbor and kindred near and dear; They were not of a parentage considered rich or great, But they were heirs to fortitude, by far the best estate.
Ever conscious of their duty, they were ready hand and heart, And when that called for action they were sure to do their part; Their little worn, hard-scrabble farm, though managed for the best, To support the growing family was experiencing a test; The want of girl and boyhood, now budding into teens, Though humble they were many and far beyond their means; The free lands of the prairies which to thrift and toil belong, Those vast and virgin acres had been calling loud and long.
The western fever spreading it struck the Simons home, And something seemed to beckon from the prairie land to come; With his wife he weighed the matter of going "Westward Ho", And after many quorums they decided they should go; 'Twas hard to leave associates and things they'd loved for years, Those who with them had mingled in laughter and in tears; They grieved to leave the village, its tree-arched streets and charm, The church where long they'd worshipped, the cottage home and farm.
They sold their village homestead to a wealthy neighbor nigh, And left with many a God-speed and many a sad good-bye, To start life new on the prairie where there was unlimited soil, Where homes and wealth abundant are free for those who toil; Free to his wife and father, awaiting the team and yolk, Fertile and primitive acres awaiting the yeoman's stroke; Acres not for the shiftless, riches not for the shirk, Homes and wealth for the millions, with the one essential work.
In the west the Simons family made good as the years went by, The children all in homes of their own had settled on homesteads nigh; John Simons and wife had retired, through the press of advancing years, But often the patient mother gave way to homesick tears, She becoming reminiscent when freed from motherly care, Longed for the things of her girlhood and the friends away back there; Though a score of years had gone wringing yet fresh in her memory still, Were things that were near and friends that were dear 'way back in Farmersville.
