Henry Burrell Promises To Become A Good-living Citizen If He Is Given A Chance

Henry Burrell, the man who was sentenced to two and one-half years in Kingston penitentiary, by Judge Houston, on a charge of wife-desertion, is out on parole. He arrived in this city last night.

Burrell appears to be a changed man. He is neatly dressed and has a general air of prosperity.

"I want to become a good citizen," he told a Planet reporter this morning, "and I will, if they will only give me a show. I am only out on parole now, and if I don't succeed in getting a pardon, I will still have a year and 11 months to put in. I have made up my mind to be good, and I hope they will give me a chance to stick to my resolution. That is all I have to say just now."

Burrell spent last night and this morning with his wife on Park St. It is likely that an effort will be made to secure a pardon for the man in order to give him a chance to make good. He says that as soon as he can get work, he will support his wife and family, and keep the peace.

Most of the readers of The Planet are familiar with the details of the Burrell case, and there is no need of repetition. Burrell is a veteran of the Boer war. It is believed if a pardon is obtained for him he will reform and become a good citizen.

Imitations given by Ladies Orchestra Were So Real That One Man Was Completely Mystified

A rather amusing incident occurred at the concert given by the Cleveland Ladies' Orchestra in the First Church last evening. The ladies were giving a number, "The Old Mill," as an encore number for the string instruments. It was a work of art the way they rendered it and the imitations accompanying were realistic in the extreme.

There was one man in the side gallery who was drinking in every number on the program with evident relish and satisfaction, and when it came to the "Mill" he was completely won. He was sitting in a poor seat—poor, in that he could not see the whole orchestra. When the machinery was put in motion, the mill stones clicked together, the water swished, and the grain came pouring down the chute, the man's eyes bulged out with wonder. He leaned far over in his seat, but he was unable from his position to see where the water was coming from. Forgetting for the time that it was a clever imitation, he rose from his seat and walked down the aisle to the front of the gallery, and when the music stopped and he awakened, he found himself leaning far over railing, still trying to figure out where the orchestra kept the water and the grain. He also became painfully aware that he was the centre of attraction, and the sensations of embarrassment were so strong within him that he made a hasty exit in confusion, and for the balance of the evening the ladies lost one of their most ardent admirers. One of the mysteries of a public man's life is how his friends see everything bad and miss everything good that is printed about him.
