(BY SIR WALTER SCOTT, BART.)

CHAPTER XIV .- (Continued.) With sly gravity, interru ted only by private signs to each other. the Norman knights and nobles beheld the ruder demeanour of Athelstane and Cedric at a banquet, to the form and fashion of which they were unaccustomed. And while their manners were thus the subject of sarcastic observation, the untaught Saxons unwittingly transgressed several of the arbitrary rules established for the regulation of society. "Now, it is well known, that a man may with more To the People of the City of Fredericton impunity be guilty of an actual and the Public generally. breach either of real good breeding or of good merals, than appear ignorant of the most minute point And thanking his numerous custom- of fachionable etiquette.
