aweethearts would join in singing the prayer book version of the 131st Psalm :

'theliered beneath the Almighty's wings It was sung as only those can sing who with stout hearing out, because it is their duty, to danger and to death.

It was one evening after being wearied and worn out by the work and trials of the day, that Kingsley wrote the song which reproduced the soenes of his youthful days.

Judge not the Lord by feeble sense, But trust Rim for His gence; the Prince waiting several minutes, and, in reply to the Prince's demand whether he had announced him, said, rather unpertinently, "No." Now Binnarck, as all the world knows, is irritated in a moment, and the flunkey's imperturbability simply threw him into a white heat. In a great rage he burstout, "You old foo! "Why not!" and was going away, when Lord Dufferm looked out of his room and proceeded to suplain. It seems that Lady Dufferin was dressing and that "Chawles," who thought the Prince wished to see the Oonneess, had been told by the lady's onsaid that her mistress was not at And rides uson the storm.

Behind a frowning providence He hides a smiling face.

For severall years Cowper's apleudid intellect was to be under a total solipse. The penumbra was already darkening its disc. But in full view of the impending calamity, the inspired son of song chanted forth those strains of holy cheer: The hides a suiling face.

Cowper never could have sung that unblime anthers of victory except under the immediate inspiration of "power from on high." The storm was coming, but Cowper's ore of faith as w "Jehovah riding above the sterm." This match-less bymn of providence which God put into the soul of flie afflicted servant has been a "song in the night" to millions of people under the discouraging clouds of adversity.
