HELEN MOIR OR LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE.
CHAPTER XXIII.

"You remember the circumstances now, I think," said the lawyer, speaking for the first time, and thereby drawing Mangles' suspicious look more particularly towards himself. He seemed to divine Weggate's profession, and looked more guarded and suspicious than ever.

"Come, I say, this won't do," he said at length. "I am not to be drawn or dropped upon. I have had had games with a clever player as you, and have long since learned to watch my hand and get a glimpse of my antagonist's play. Catch me going one inch in the dark. You understand?"

"Not quite. What do you mean?" "I mean that you must deal more openly with me, or, by G—d, you'll not get a word out of me."

"We shall deal openly with you," responded the lawyer. "We have no motive and not the slightest wish to do otherwise. The youth lost five hundred pounds to you that night. We do not mean to ask whether he lost it fairly or—on the opposite—but you know what came out of it. There was a forged bank bill; young Allerton was charged with the forgery; he did not deny it; his friends got the affair quieted; and he left the country. You know all that?"

"Well," replied Mangles, "I don't see as it will do me any harm to say I do."

"It will do you no harm, whatever you say," said the lawyer, in an emphatic tone. "There is not the least intention on our part to call any one to account for what took place in the saloon that night. Our sole and only object is to know the truth about that bank bill. I may tell you at once that this young gentleman is Edwin Allerton's nephew; his uncle is still alive, and it is of the utmost importance to him and his friends that the truth should be known. Looking at the story as he tells it, it seems to us possible, if not probable, that the truth did not come out at the time. You are the only man alive who can declare it, its declaration will not hurt you or any one in the least, and we shall not object to reward you with a little money to relieve your necessities. Now you know the whole matter."

The bleared eyes of Mangles twinkled, and his sharp face became acute and knowing in its expression.

"Oh ho, that's it, is it?" he slowly observed. "I thought I was down in my luck for good and all, but here has a chance turned up for me yet, and I'm not the fool to miss it. Now, then, what are you going to stand for my information?"

The old passion was now in his soul, and gleamed with eager avidity in his hollow eyes, and the hand by his side shook with double intensity in his excitement.

"I shall pay you liberally, you may depend on it," exclaimed Edwin. "I shall give you—"

"Stay," counselled the more prudent lawyer. "By your words and manner you seem conscious that the information you are able to give is of importance to us."

"And so it is," answered Mangles. "It is of the very utmost importance, and you will find it so. I swear it."

"For God's sake deal liberally with him," whispered Edwin to the lawyer. "He is evidently able to clear my uncle's character, and I will give any sum to attain that object."

"Have no misgivings, my dear sir," answered Weggate, in the same low tone. "We shall get from him all he can tell us, but let the arrangements be such as will really benefit him. To give him a large sum of money and leave him here would be to terminate his life. Let me manage it, and I think I shall effect a settlement which shall be highly to his benefit."

"All right," said Edwin. "Only get the important truth out of him."

"Look here, Mangles," said Weggate, addressing the wreck of humanity which lay before them. "Your condition is a miserable and a wretched one. You have no friends, you have no money, and you are utterly helpless."

"Don't I know all that?" growled the man, savagely.

"Well, suppose we gave you even a large sum of money for this information, it would soon be gone, and your miserable condition would not be improved. Suppose, instead, that we removed you from this wretched place, put you in clean decent lodgings, where you would be kept comfortable and your necessary wants supplied?"

"For life?" exclaimed Mangles.

"Yes, for life."

"What security have I for it?"

"The security of my word—James Weggate, attorney, Milk Street."

"And mine," cried the youth—"Edwin Allerton, of Allerton Hall, Herefordshire."

"And mine," thundered the Squire—

"Frank Oakley, of Oakley Grange, Surrey."
"All right," said Mangles. "I will tell you everything."
