A Safe of Sunshine and Shadew-Makes
Others Famous-Dies Unknown.

From the Arkansau Traveler.

Among the workers who with brain or musele toil their way through this weary world, the newspaper reporter seems to occupy an anomalous position. The whole course of his life alternating between the deepest shadows and the wildest merriment show that he is at once the most courted and neglected, the most sought for and shunned, hated, feared, underrated and shunned, nated, leared, underrated and overestimated factor in modern society. At the regulation social gathering, "The Prees" is toasted amid applause and the response always alludes to "the great power" and the "moral lever," but the world knows nothing of the trisls attending the life of the average reporter. the world knows nothing of the trisis attending the life of the average reporter. The plaudite of the public are sometimes wafted into the editorial sanctum, but the poor reporter, unnoticed, has to see the credit which should belong to him given

The nature of 'he reporter's business enables him to estimate human nature, as he sees his fellowman under all circumstances. In all the scenes which go to make up the drama of life, the reporter is on hand, quick, apt, and ready to take a mental photograph which will include the most minure details. As circumstances require he must be able to spread a trivial occurrence over a column of space without repetition, or describe the most thrilling scene in a paragraph. He must be ready at the call of duty to fraternize with the repetition, or describe the most thrilling scene in a paragraph. He must be ready at the call of duty to fraternize with the bar-room rough, and be competent to discuss theology with a doctor of divinity. To night he is wading among the slums of a great city viewing vice in its most hideous form, to morrow he may be sitting in the parlor of the merchant prince, with whom, for the time being, he is on terms of equality. He shakes hands with the condemned murderer, and turns to hob nob with the judge who pronounced the sentence.

The animber of persons seen under the influence of drink on Sundays, if not actually drunk, was very large.

At the recent sale of the cellars of the late Earl of Wilton, at Egerton lodge, Melton Mowbray, and Grosvenor square, London, the prices resilized may seem rather startling to American eyes.
