It was eleven o'clock before Aleck, after a busy evening, followed by a brisk walk in the frosty air, opened the gate leading through a deep yard, to the squire's handsome dwelling. That gentleman himself opened the side door as Aleck went lightly up the steps of the porch.

'All about me,' he said. 'Come in and I will pay you for your trouble.'

"Come in,' repeated the squire, with semething more than mere politeness in his voice, and the lad obeyed. A gust of wind from the open door-way sent the papers on the library table flying like a flock of sea-gulls to all parts of the room. Aleck removed his cap and mittens, and picking up the papers re. mittens, and picking up the papers re-turned them to the table. As the squire put a letter that he had been squire put a letter that he had been writing into its envelope he watched the lad out of a corner of his eye.

'Going to school this winter!' he asked.

'I suppose not, sir. I am looking for something to do.'

'What do you want?'

'I will give you work, then, and we will see what you make of it. This call to Washington is very unexpected to me as you perhaps know. My wife and daughters are to go with me. I have had time for very few arrangements. The housekeeper and her husband are to be left in charge, but they are getting old. You may come here and stay and go to the high school, and do for your clothes and board whatever you see needs to be done.'

'What shall you expect me to do, sirl' asked Aleck, looking puzzled.

'You may get the mail three times a day. The postmaster has been directed what is to be forward. It
