The Crossing Paths, Our far diverging lines of life,
Have for a moment crossed,
To touch, and wind away, and be
In the dim distance lost.
No chance in all our wanderings
Has brought us heretofore
So face to face, to pause, and speak,
And part, and meet no more,

As passing ships, whose wide-flung sails
Are for an instant furled,
We hall, sud barter words of cheer,
Brought from the under-world;
With eager question, quick reply,
Across the deck we lean;
Then part and put the silences
Of ocean wastes between. We turn and watch the fading sail
Until our eyes grow dim,
And the blue billows melt away
One the horizon's rim.
How sad it seems! a few brief words,
A kins, a hand-clasp given;
Then—paths that cross on land or sea,
No more this side of heaven!

Well, let them cross, as cross they may,
And let them still diverge,
Sundered by leagues of desert land,
By mountain or by surge,—
We know there is one central spot
No traveling feet have passed,
Where earth's divergent, crossing paths
Shall meet and end at last!
