Cupid Turns the Tables.

By MARTHA COBB SANFORD.

(Copyright, 1908, by E. C. Parcell).

It began on the Greenwich local. The man sitting beside Henrietta on the cross seat was reading a typewritten manuscript.

"Either an author or an editor," mused Henrietta, and soon allowed her curiosity to get the better of her to the extent of looking over her neighbor's shoulder and reading the story with him.

It proved to be a love story, and as it progressed, Henrietta stole a surreptitious glance at the man every now and then. But his expression gave no clue to the impression the story might be making.

Once as he turned a page, he looked up suddenly, and became aware that Henrietta was following the story. She blushed and started to apologize, but he put her at her ease in quite an unexpected manner.

"I'm glad you're reading the story," he said, with a friendly smile. "A woman wrote it, and I hope you'll give me your opinion, when we've finished it."

So they read on together. When they had reached the end, they sat for a moment silent, each evidently absorbed in thought.

"Well," said the man at length, "that is perhaps what would happen in real life—but the ending isn't satisfactory from my viewpoint."

"And what is your viewpoint?" ventured Henrietta, her interest in the situation overpowering momentarily her natural shyness. "Are you judging it as just a plain man or as an editor?"

Her query seemed both to please and amuse him, and Henrietta, pleased to find herself answering his smile quite as if they were old acquaintances.

"I'm judging it," he said, "as an editor who tries to imagine himself just a plain man. But what do you think about it?"

"I'm afraid I agree with the author," answered Henrietta, somewhat timidly, "but really my opinion doesn't count in the least, because—"

"But to get back to the point in question. You mean that 'love at first sight' isn't worth writing about—that the type of woman who would consent to marry a man on short acquaintance isn't the stuff that heroines are made of?"

"Not exactly that, perhaps. But any one could make the story end happily—have them marry, I mean. That would have been the ordinary way. I must have taken some courage to end it the other way, and it seems to me the story's stronger for it."

"But you see," persisted the editor, "everything in the story goes to show that this man and woman thought they met just once casually, as you and I are meeting, were much more an rapport. Why then, does the author never have them meet again, after making her reader feel that they ought, by all that is happy and harmonious to belong to each other?"

Henrietta smiled at the man's earnestness. "Well," she began defensively, "perhaps the author was trying to show that although the man and a woman may meet by accident, like that, and even feel and admit to himself or herself, that they really belong to each other, yet neither one quite dares—Oh, I'm afraid I don't just know how to express it," she broke off, blushing com-hid her blushing face in her hands. A few days later, when Henrietta read the "New Fiction Magazine" asking her to call at his office for the purpose of talking over her story, she smiled archly, dressed herself most becomingly and made her way promptly but more or less tremulously, to his august sanctum. It was a novel situation.

What if he had reversed his original opinion, too? Would she, or wouldn't she be pleased?

The editor's surprise proved intensely amusing to Henrietta, at least.

"You—the author herself?" was all he was able to gasp. Then he broke out into a hearty laugh, in which Henrietta joined merrily.

"You still hold to your first opinion, I suppose?" Henrietta asked tentatively.

"More firmly than ever," was the editor's emphatic reply.

"Then the story is rejected?" queried Henrietta wistfully.

"Not if I can convince the author into my way of thinking," he answered brightly. "I have great confidence in my own powers of persuasion."

Henrietta looked skeptical. Since he chose to be so confident, she would never let him know that she was half persuaded already. She would defend her original ending of the story, just to keep him guessing.

And the arguments upon arguments that followed! Was ever the fate of a story held so long in the balance? And all the time that Henrietta was defending the story as it stood, in her own heart she was recasting it as the man willed and wanted.

A suspicion of the true state of affairs gradually convinced the editor that her best play was to confess himself vanquished.

Henrietta was radiant.

"There," she cried triumphantly, "I've made you take it just as it is. You didn't win me over after all."

"Didn't I?" was all the editor said, but looked straight into her eyes.

Henrietta lowered hers, but made no reply.

And then the editor did a very curious thing.

"I suppose you are going to put your theories into practice, then, and never let me see you again? Of course you'd rather keep our acquaintance a memory and not let it be spoiled by any such commonplace thing as love and

There are many reasons why you should ask for the above well advertised articles, but absolutely none why you should let a substituting dealer palm off something which he claims to be "just as good," or "better" or "the same thing" as the article you ask for.

The buying public recognize the superior quality of well advertised and standard articles like Gillett's goods. The substituter realizes this fact and tries to sell inferior goods on the advertiser's reputation.
