An early use of camounage by the French was the application of paint is to big guns in order to make them resemble the foliage in which they were partly concealed. However, when the guns had to be placed in the open disguise only accentuated their visibility. The protective coloration of birds and animals gave a hint to the camoundeurs who saw that it disguised the outlines of these creatures and counteracted to a considerable degree their undershadows. So the high lights along the gun barrels were darkened and their undershadows. So the high lights along the gun barrels were darkened and their undershadows. The finishing touches to this work consisted in irregular streakings and blotches which broke the outlines and at least confused the observer if they did not serve to produce invisibility.—Popular Science Monthly.
