Chased by Wolves.

BY LIEUTENANT MURRAY.

It is scarcely one year since the events which we relate occurred upon the northern slopes of Russia. An Englishman, named Hubert, had received an invitation from a young nobleman to visit him at his frigid northern home, where he had promised him among other inducements, the game being brought to him, the game being brought to him, the game being brought to him...

Chased by Wolves.

him and devour his body at once. These creatures, crazed with hunger, tore themselves to pieces in a short time, fighting over the body only to secure a mouthful, and were soon trampled under the hoofs of the nobleman's horses. The young Englishman, on his part, had two shotguns, one having assisted him to enter that of another before his horse was shot.

Chased by Wolves.

They fired again, each one killing a wolf; but a few moments and many grating moans devoured the wounded Englishman. In the meantime the horses were kept at a steady and lively gait. It was a desperate dash of speed; for if they were to give out, the travellers would be torn to pieces in five minutes, as well as the horses themselves.

Chased by Wolves.

They were rapidly emptied into their ranks. Each drew his revolver, and the gentlemen taking a revolver in each hand, and Ivan, the driver, taking the reins in his left, cocked his revolver with the right hand, just in time. Fifty open mouths were beside the sleigh on either side, and a hundred behind.

Chased by Wolves.

Now, all together, said the count; "let 'em have it, right and left." Ivan, who was perfectly cool, fired his six charges, and a half-dozen of the wolves, while the count with both hands fired down their throats on his side, and the Englishman, though with less coolness, yet with equal effect, shot more than a dozen of them on his side.

Chased by Wolves.

Immediately on entering the ground, behind the high walls of which they were of course safe, the count sent for brandy and hot water. The Englishman had fainted at last from excitement and exertion. He poured out half a tumbler with some honey, and made Ivan drink it as hot as possible, but the count himself gave it clear, and in small spoonfuls at a time, until he brought him quite to himself again.
