Katharine's Sacrifice

A STATE OF THE STA

CHAPTER XVIII.

The next morning, as Miss Mostyn was in the hands of her maids, there ame a most amoving piece of intelligence, brought by Mrs. Trevanion, that diss Brereton was too ill to leave her bed.

"And you have come to me direct from her, I suppose, Aunt Mildred?" Barbara cried in alarm. Olympe, give me that toilet vinegar. It is sure to be a fever, or some horrible infectious thing; please don't come so close to me, Aunt Mil-

Mrs. Trevanion subsided and went away, while Miss Mostyn ordered this and countermanded that, and generally conducted herself in the manner most conducted herself in the manner most annoyed and angry.

"Is she going to spoil all my plans?"
she thought, viciously, and having carefully ascertained that there was no possibility of her contracting any illness seeing Katharine, she minoed away her high heels to that part of the ho in which Miss Brereton was located.

in which Miss Brereton was located. There was no answer to her sharp tap at the door, and turning the handle unceremoniously, Barbara walked in.

Katharife way lying on the pillows, parfectly rigid and still; her beautiful hair was unbound and was thrown in careless luxuriance away from her. She was deathly pale, save for the deep black marks that encircled her closed eyes.

In her nervousness and selfishness, Barbara hesitated to approach the bed; it seemed to her as though it was the face of a dead woman she saw. But while she was thinking this, the long, dark eyelashes were raised, and Katharine's eyes met hers. Barbara frowned for a moment. Despite the pallor, the unmistakable marks of suffering, Katharine's face was as supremely lovely as ever; and, knowing this, Barbara's jealous hatred swelled still more in her hereast.

without in the least modulating her high clear voice. "I hope it is nothing ser ions."

All trace of her brief sympathy and kindliness had disappeared. Katharine, ill as she was, saw that; she felt that she would get no pity from this girl, or receive any friendyl attention.

She struggled to raise her head from the nillow.

She struggrea to the pillow.

"It is nothing much—a cold," she murmured, and the hoarseness in her tones bore testimony to the truth of the last assertion. "I—I shall be better in an hour."

She tried to gather the thick masses of her hair together and push it into one coil, but the effort was too much, she was obliged to desist.
"I am sure I hope so," Miss Mostyn observed, curtty, "for there is a great deal to be done before to-morrow. Really, I think Lady Drummond should have ascertained the condition of your health before engaging you; but Aunt Ellen is always so impetatous."
Katharine drew her breath with something like a sigh.

thing like a sigh.
"I—I am afraid I do not please you,"
she said, humbly and weakly. "I had

"Oh, we settled all that yesterday,

"Th, we settled all that yesterday," Barbara said, stretching her thin hips into a semilance of a smile. She was looking about her with sharp, quick eyes to discover anything that might go to strengthen the suspicion that had come into her mind. "If you can't get up, you can't, and so there is an end of the matter. I need not tell you how very inconvenient this is, coming to-day of all days: but I presume you would not be ill if you could help it. I will leave these letters on the table for you to answer if you can, in an bour's time, and please let me know when they are done."

done."

And with that, Barbara walked out of the room, closing the door behind her with a sharp teng, that brought a moan of pain from Katharine's lips, and sent the pulses throbbing in her aching head.

As Miss Mostyn entered the large breakfast room, she discovered Lord Otway there alone, standing by one of the open windows. His face looked strangely worn and pale; there was an air of missery over it which had completely changed it.

He greeted Barbara with a smile and true in his cars.

He was loyal to his darling.

"You forget that Miss Brereton has been very ill. Her accident was naturally a blow to her nerves, and now about it? She is always so reticent with me." Barbara was feverishly eager to know all he knew. "How did happen?"

Lord Otway looked at her in surprise. "Miss Brereton is the lady whom I ed it.

He greeted Barbara with a smile, and then went on to say that a most unfortunate circumstance had occurred to cut short his visit, and oalt him back to rheumatism. I knew you would be sorry, Lord Otway, you have such a kind heart, and are always so sympathetic to people in her position of life." She was watching him keenly all the time, though apparently she was occupied in culling for herself a small bouquet of roses from the branches of the creeper that nodded in at the windows.

Ormande said nothing. For the life of him he could not speak.

Katharine was ill, that was all he could think of. Katharine, his beautiful Katharine, the queen of his dreams, the love of his whole heart, ill, ill, and sufering alone, and he must know this and do nothing! It completely unnerved him. Hope had died in his breast during the long night hours. It was crushed down, never to rise again; how could he let it live with the memory of those last words ringing in his ears.

"I cannot love you. I cannot.—I am not free!"

But though hope was dead, his love lived stronger than ever. He had told

"I cannot love you. I cannot—I am not free!"
But though hope was dead, his love lived stronger than ever. He had told himself he would bear his disappointment bravely, that he would meet his sorrow as though it had never been; he had preached and taught submission so often, now he would practice what he had preached. In his grief he had confessed sorrowfully to himself that Heaven had punished him rightly: he had grown to dwell too much on Katharine, on her sweet love, and the happiness that might be in the future, that he had neglected his duties, and allowed himself to push aside the claims of others. Henceforth he determined to bury his heart's secret, and go on in the path, he had chosen, no matter how full of briars it might be, and now in the very birth of his brave resolutions came this blow, this news that staggered and unnerved.

taggered and unnerved.

He forgot his own suffering to remem ber hers. The look of agony on her dear, sweet face as he beheld it last might rushed to his mind once more. If —if only he might be allowed to comfort her, to give her help with this burden of love that was weighing her down.

Barbara watched him intently.

"How he loves her!" she said to herself, with bitter mortification and venom. "He thinks her an angel of beauty and purity. I must destroy that conclusion. He shall not go away till be has seen of what clay his idol is made. Then—then"—Barbara picked a rose to pieces with thin, hard fingers—"then he must learn to turn to me for sympathy. He is so simple I think I shall be able to manage him. Now, if everything turns as I have planned, I everything turns as I have planned, I may yet hold the trump card in my hand," and while she was thinking this

"Do you know, Lord Otway, I have "Do you know, Lord Otway, I have wanted to discuss her with you ever since I knew you were coming. I am so distressed about her. She is not happy. Oh, no, no; she is not happy. She seems to me"—Barbara pronounced each word distinctly—"as if she had some great secret on her mind, something she was afraid of, herself. I wish"—Barbara picked another rose—"I wish that you in your caracity of "I wish that you in your capacity of elergyman would try and comfort her slittle. I am sure—"

little. I am sure——"
But Ormande broke in sharply.
"It is impossible," he said, shrinking from so great a temptation as seeing and speaking to Katharine again. "Miss Breereton would resent my interference, and rightly, too."
"But you, yourself, see that she is unhappy, noor girl. I long to do some

"Ah! how glad I am to hear you say that! I wanted to rouse your interest in her so much, dear Lord Otway!" Inin her so much, dear Lord Otway!" Indeed there was quite a flush of excitement on Barbara's cheeks. "I want her to make a friend of me, to confide in me. It is strange and sad that one so young as she should look as she does."

Ormande felt, he scarcely knew why, uneasy. There was much apparent sympathy and interest in Miss Mostyn's manner, but somehow it did not visue manner, but somehow it did not ring true in his ears.

"Her accident! Oh, did she tell you about it? She is always so reticent with me." Barbara was feverishly eager to know all he knew. "How did it happen?"

Lord Otway looked at her in surprise. "Miss Brereton is the lady whom I was fortunate enough to assist one afternoon at Northminster station. You may romanber Miss Mastro. it was the

of it.

He greeted Barbara with a smale, and then went on to say that a most unfortunate circumstance had occurred to cut short his visit, and oall him back to town.

Barbara's heart stood still for a moment.

"What! Go away before my birthday, Lord Otway? No, no; I cannot allow it?"

Ormande's eyes were fixed on the suntit trees outside.

"I'm afraid I have no choice, Miss Mostyn, I really ought to have been back at work last week. I—I must go now."

"But you only came yesterday, and then you told me you should stay eeveral days. Has anything happened since then?"

Barbara put the question almost innocently. At once she had guessed the truth—symething had occurred between aKtharine and him; and Ormande any sweed her hurrielly:

"Yes, something has happened, Miss Mostyn, and I must go."

"Oh, dear!" Barbara ast down moourn' fully. There is going to be nothing but disappointment, and I did hope it would have been such a pleasant time. Yoo going away so hurriedly, and there is my dear Miss Brereton will have been such a pleasant time. Yoo going away so hurriedly, and there is my dear Miss Brereton mystairs so dread, fully ill, I am quite alarmed about her."

The shot told. Ormande started, and she saw one of his hands clutch the stoot window-frame, while his face faded into a greater pallor.

"Miss—Miss Brereton ill" he said, speaking as well as his agitation would liet him. "3—is—" He could get no further.

"Oh, it is nothing infectious," Barbara answered, blandly. "I have just come from her. It is only a sarry had cold and the head to have done for wany on hurriedly. "I have just come from her. Girl's Pitiful Death Trying to Hide

THE OLD STORY

Died at St. Catharines Hospital From Blood Poisoning.

St. Catharines, Oct. 1.-An inques was begun to-night into the death of Susan Clark, aged 18, of Napanee, who died last night at the hospital.

Only two witnesses were examined outside of the doctors, who performed believed a criminal operation was performed, yet the memories of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Willford, with whom the deceased stopped while in the city, were so uncertain in regard to names and dates that adjournment was made and dates that adjournment was me for three weeks. The assistance

Toronto will be asked for.

Mrs. Willford testified to having first met the Clark girl at Centre Is-land, Toronto, a year ago, when Susan worked as a domestic for Mrs. Mead. She also stated that the dec a sister Florence in Toronto. Withheard nothing further from the heard nothing further from the girl until two weeks ago, when she re-ceived word from Susan that she was coming to pay her a visit. Several days later she arrived from Toronto. After Susan had confided her in-tention of procuring an abortion, Mrs. Willford said she tried to dissuade the girl and only went to the Falls with her last Friday to keep her from committing suicide, as she had threat-ened to do!

Mrs. Willford admits, however, going to a street door of a doctor's offie at Niagara Falls, N.Y. Susie went in for five minutes, ame out and said it was all over.

Last Wednesday, Dr. Chapman was called in by Mr. Willford, and on Thursday the girl's case became so serious that she was removed to the hospital, where she died before midnight of septic peritonitis, refusing herself to divulge to Dr. Chapman the name of the doctor who performed the abortion, but admitting that one had taken in Toronto by "whole glassfuls" had failed.

The Crown authorities are anxious to locate the young couple who accompanied the Clark girl to St. Catharines from Toronto, and who stopged at the International Hotel. here, according to Harry Willford's evidence. The couple, he says, were married here the next day by Rev. Manley Benson, and accompanied his wife and the Clark girl to Niagara Falls and there disappeared. Willford speaks of the couple as "Mr. and Mrs. Culture."

MINISTER MISSING.

Gets Week's Holiday to Go Home But Disappears.

Moneton, N.B., Oct. 1.-The mysille, near Woodstock and Moncton ville, near Woodstock and Moncton, of Rev. R. Gordon Warman, son of W. A. Warman, of the I. C. R., this city, is reported.

He had been preaching on circuit at Oakville, and obtained a week's leave of absence to come to Moncton to visit his parents, with whom he lives with his two-year-old daughter. Since then he has not been heard of, and his parents are very much worried. Telephone messages all over the country have had no result.

He is about 25 years of age and returned last year from Labrador mission. He was married three years ago, his wife dying about a year ago.

THREW HIM OVER.

at Detroit Dock Attributed to Marine Strikers.

Detroit, Mich., Oct. 1.-Two men believed to be marine strikers, crept upon the deck of the steamer North upon the deck of the steamer Northern Queen, lying at the foot of Randolph street, last night, and picking up William Janich, a deckhand, threw him into the river. Janich cannot swim. His cries for help were heard by other members of the crew on board and he was rescued. While all were in the cabin a few minutes later an attempt was made to cast the steamer adrift by slipping the hawser holding her to the dock, but this was discovered before she had moved more than a few feet. The police have two sailors under arrest on suspicion.

Proprietors of Kingston liquor stores say they have a hard task keeping track of the 100 men on the Indian list, and Magistrate Farrell suggests that they get a group photo of them. Hotelkeepers know them better.
