AN ARMY PORTIA.

By Charles King, U. S. Army.

AUTHOR OF "THE COLONEL'S DAUGHTER," "THE DESERTER," "FROM THE RANKS," "DUNRAVEN RANCH," "TWO SOLDIERS," ETC.

The court had not been authorized to sit without regard to hours. Lawler agued that in a case of such wide-spread interest the sessions should be held when it would be most convenient for the world at large to attend, and by adjourning at 3 p.m., the conventional hour, all good citizens would be able to get home in abundance of time, secure in the belief that nothing would transpire before they could return to their post of observation on the morrow. Nothing of great consequence was accomplished on the first day, beyond the ceremony of swearing the court, which Lawler rendered as impressive as possible, the administering of the judge-advocate's oath, which Colonel Grace rattled through in a perfunctory style that robbed the legal gentleman of the dramatic effect he had contemplated, and the reading of the charges and specifications, which were breathlessly listened to by the throng and most oratorically delivered by the judge-advocate. There was something especially fine in the air with which he turned and faced the soldierly young officer who, in his trim fatigue uniform, stood opposite to him at the table.

"To the first specification of the first charge, how say you, sir?—guilty or not guilty?"

And, in the simplest way in the world, the answer came in tones sufficiently clear to be audible beyond the open window:

"Not guilty."

And so to each and every specification and to the charges of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman and of conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline, Lieutenant Hearn calmly protested his entire innocence, and the pleas were duly recorded.

Then Colonel Lawler announced that in view of the importance and probable length of the case he desired the services of a stenographer and requested the authority of the court to call one in. The president looked perturbed; stenographers were expensive, and the last court he was at had been rapped over the knuckles for employing one, although the record exceeded a hundred and fifty pages in length.

"How long will you need one, and how soon can you get him here?" asked Colonel Grace.

"Well, we can get through with this case in a very short time with a stenographer, but it will take a week at least without one." He did not say, however, that he had one already in the room, in the shape of a newspaper man from Chicago. Some of the court began to consult among themselves.

"Make him write his own proceedings," whispered Colonel Maitland to the president. "By gad, he was probably the man that rapped your court for employing one there at Omaha last month." Then he scribbled a line and tossed the scrap of paper over to Major Putnam on the other side, and passed word down to Captain Thorp, who had been judge-advocate of the court in question. It was evident that the members thought that here was an admirable chance to "work" the judge-advocate, a thing seldom enjoyed; and at last old Grace, humming and bowing a little, said that the court could not see the necessity, in view of the remarks made by the division headquarters on a recent case, and must for the present decline the request. Whereat Colonel Lawler, in manifest ill humor, remarked that he could hardly safely expected to say what would and what would not be approved by the division commander, and that, if the court would not order it, he would get the order by telegraph.

"All right," said the president; "and meantime we'll proceed without one. I suppose you are ready with your first witness, Mr. Judge-Advocate?"

"If the court insists, yes; but I prefer to wait until I hear from the telegram which I am now writing."

"We had better go right ahead," said Colonel Grace.

And so amidst profound silence, the name of the first witness was called; and with the eyes of the entire room upon him, neatly dressed, cleanly shaved, and looking his very best, Trooper Welsh was ushered in from the outer gallery, was sworn impressively by Lawler, and was asked for his name, rank and regiment, and whether he knew the accused. The new correspondent of the Palladium described the hasty glance which Welsh cast at the lieutenant as one in which "his glowering, dark eyes kindled with the pent-up sense of the wrongs and humiliations heaped upon him by the officer in question." Major Kenyon, sitting close by Mrs. Lane, looked at Brodie with swift whispered comment on that furtive glance. Miss Marshall never took her eyes from the witness's face.

"State how long you have been in the service, and with what company you have served."

"I've been——" then there was a sudden dropping of the eyelids and a moment's hesitation, but only a moment's—"I've been in Troop C, Eleventh Cavalry, about eight months, stationed here at Fort Ryan. I enlisted in St. Louis a year ago."

The judge-advocate was just writing out the answer, when Miss Marshall leaned over and whispered a work to Kenyon. The major nodded appreciatively and looked eagerly along the faces of the members of the court across the table. Captain Thorp's eyes met his, and it was Thorp who suddenly spoke:

"The witness has not answered the question, as I understand it."

"He has answered as the court understands it," said Lawler, sharply, "and entirely to my satisfaction."

"He may have answered to the satisfaction of the judge-advocate, but I suggest that the court can speak for itself," was Thorp's cool reply. "The question should have elicited an answer as to the entire service, possible in other commands, on the part of the witness; and he replies only as to C troop."

"He has given the exact information I desired," said Lawler hastily, "and all my question was intended to cover. I protest against interference with my witnesses."

Bang! came old Grace's sword-hilt on the table.

"It is 3 o'clock, Mr. Judge-Advocate, and the court will adjourn."

Lawler drew a long breath, and glanced triumphantly at Thorp.

But, however little the first day brought forth, the second in no wise lacked sensation. Welch and Mr. Levi Schonberg, in terms most emphatic, had described the assault upon the principal witness; both declared that with brutal violence Welsh had been dragged forth from the bar-room and then kicked and cuffed all the way to the guard-house; both denied the faintest provocation or excuse; and then, amid oppressive stillness, Mr. Schonberg had described his connection with the trader's establishment six years before, and his knowledge of the pecuniary dealings of the accused. In positive terms he asserted that old Mr. Braine had lent the accused sums aggregating six hundred dollars at different times, and that he had frequently and vainly importuned him, in letters written by Schonberg, for payment, had been ignored and that finally, when he, after the accused returned to the post, strove to collect the amount, he, the witness, was met with curt refusal, denials of all indebtedness, and finally with threats and assault. Nothing much more connected could well be imagined. Both men were positive and precise as to facts and dates, and both when cross-examined by the accused stuck stoutly and positively to their versions. Another witness was Mrs. Schonberg that was and Mrs. Braine that had been, and her testimony, though by no means truculent or positive, was largely in support of that of her Jewish spouse. She was sure of the loans to Hearn; sure he had never repaid them; sure that Brain had directed them placed upon the books, and had frequently spoken to her of them, because she thought that he was too open-handed and credulous, and had told him so.

When court adjourned at 3 p.m., on the second day the case had gone bad against Hearn, and Colonel Grace gravely inquired if he could not procure counsel even now; it might still be allowed. But Hearn quietly shook his head. Wednesday morning was to have brought the redoubtable Mr. Abrams to the scene to aid the case for the prosecution, but Colonel Lawler was compelled to say that the witness was not forthcoming, and had not even answered telegrams sent him. There was some quiet grinning at the reporter's table, and old Kenyon breathed a sigh as he bent over and whispered to Brodie—

"He never meant to come, and Lawler knows it. Cross-examination would have broken him all up."

But two other civilians were produced, who claimed to be old friends of the late trader, and one of them testified that the week before his death Mr. Braine had declared that Hearn had refused to repay the money and he regarded it as good as lost. Hearn protested against this as "hearsay" and not testimony under oath. Lawler vowed it was material and confirmatory, and the court was cleared, to the utter indignation of the correspondents thus compelled to quit the room with the common herd. Thrice again this happened during the day and the people grew disgusted, many of them leaving; but those who remained, including the officers, could see no earthly hope for Hearn. Everything had been as conclusively proved as such witnesses could establish matters, and the only chance lay in the impeachment of their testimony.

WRINKLES AVAUNT!

Beauty May Cost Money, But it Must be Secured.

A New York woman who for years has made a business of enhancing the beauty of society ladies has begun legal proceedings against C. P. Huntington, the millionaire railroad man, for the collection of a bill contracted by Mrs. Huntington. Mrs. Huntington is the possessor of a beautiful diamond necklace. It was presented to her by her husband, and cost a small fortune. Last winter she found that she had acquired so much flesh that she was unable to make the necklace reach around her neck, and she went for relief to the complexion artist. She said she wanted the size of her neck reduced, but in addition she desired to have a few lines and wrinkles removed from her face, and a brown spot caused by sunburn taken from her neck. It was not until there had been two or three interviews did Mrs. Huntington reveal her identity. She explained her caution by saying that she was always careful in revealing her identity at once because nearly everybody tried to "bleed" a millionaire's wife.

Day after day for weeks the beautifier worked over Mrs. Huntington. Slight wrinkles about her eyes were removed, and the lines running from the side of the nose to the corners of the mouth were removed. But, above all, the flesh on the neck began to disappear gradually, so that the diamond necklace would encircle it once more. The artist told Mrs. Huntington one day that she proposed sending her a bill just to let her know how they stood financially.

"Oh, never mind that," Mrs. Huntington is reported as saying: "I expect the bill to be a big one. Do the best you can for me, and in addition to your bill I will make you a present of the finest silk dress you can find."

The artist sent in her bill a few day later. It was for a trifle more than $900. She has never seen Mrs. Huntington since. In reply she received the following:

Madame,—I have received yours of the 23rd; I can hardly believe you seriously expected me to pay the bill as rendered. I am willing to pay a reasonable amount. One hundred dollars, I should say, would be right. Yours truly, C. P. HUNTINGTON.

The beautifier placed the account in the hands of Howe & Hummel for collection, and they have begun suit to recover the amount of the corrected bill. She is very much put out in the matter, and she said: When Mrs. Huntington first came here she insisted in this secrecy. Her visits lasted from two to three hours each, and she had exclusive use of the parlors. One day when I was very tired and wanted a cup of coffee, she even refused to let my servant come into the room. I regret that her own folly has dragged her before the public. My bill was a just one." The beautifier brought out a large pea-jacket sack which Mrs. Huntington used to wear there. "You can easily imagine," she said, "the strain produced on a little woman like me by operating on a woman who could fill that sack."

Abe Hummel said: "Inasmuch as Mr. Huntington has refused to pay more than $100 for the improvement of his wife's face, my client prefers that twelve enlightend and unprejudiced citizens shall pass on her claim in a court of justice."
