Poetry.
 God broke out years to hours and days,
 That hour by hour,
 And day by day,
 Just going on a little way,
 We might be able all along,
 To keep quite strong.
 Should all the weights of life
 Be laid across our shoulders, and the future, life,
 With wear and struggle meet us face
 to face.
 At just one place,
 Our feet would stop, and so
 God lays a little on us every day.
 And never, I believe, on all the way
 Will burdens bear so deep.
 O pathways lie so steep,
 But we can go, if by God's power
 We only bear the burden of the hour.

ON THE BANKS OF THE MOHONDAIA.
 Roskiter's rest was broken next morning by the rattle and creak of the boards upon which he stood. He looked down, and saw that he was leaning over the side of the boat. The boat was not at all steady, and he felt a slight dizziness. He looked up, and saw that the boat was leaning to the right. He felt a slight dizziness. He looked up, and saw that the boat was leaning to the right. He felt a slight dizziness.

An idea flashed into Roskiter's head. "Well, if this ain't curious," and his mind went back a dozen years to the June day when he had just set foot in the quiet city on the banks of the Mohondaia. Then he was a thoughtful, less youth fresh from college, full of ideas and dreams, not without ambition, but not one to be contemplated with pride. He had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance.

He had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance. He had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance. He had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance.

He had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance. He had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance. He had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance.

country carried with it a certain sense of spirit, and for the most part it was large and rugged. During the three years of his wanderings the sense of spirit had become a permanent part of his life. He had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance, and he had seen the boat in the distance.

Then his father died; a considerable amount of money fell to him; false friends flattered and caajoed, and he soon he was penniless. His elder brother helped him to a position, but though he did his best, his apparent indifference brought about a dismissal. His sister, a young woman with a gentle, giving heart, but the recipient soon discovered that he was a dissembler rather than an aid. He returned to his work, but his work was unprofitable, and he was repulsed by his sister for his general unkindness. He went to his room, put a few traps together, and he left his brother's house, and he went to his room, put a few traps together, and he left his brother's house.

Having settled himself to his satisfaction under the lofty elm, Roskiter opened the bundle which he had cast by his side, and he found that he had a pair of socks, a vest, and an outing shirt, and a small piece of camping gear. He looked at the bundle, and he saw that he had a pair of socks, a vest, and an outing shirt, and a small piece of camping gear.
