

growing realization of the danger and futility of those restrictions, and a genuine desire amongst men of goodwill throughout the world to get rid of them. The degree of success that we may expect will depend entirely upon continued close co-operation among the free nations, and upon their wholehearted readiness to be helpful in a job which is bound to require a great deal of care, patience, and mutual goodwill. The task of whittling away the restrictions that now encumber the trade of all but a small number of countries is one worthy of the best effort of all those who find in unrestricted commerce the best hope of peace and prosperity for all the peoples of the world.

---

s/c