The Advocate does not seem to be at ease in reference to the Indiantown Branch, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Snowball lost no time in proceedthat his tender was accepted. It has changed its tone somewhat, however. as formerly, when it was expressing a half-hearted, half-defined idea that the Government was disposed not to go on with the work, but puts on a being forgotten or his responsibility "we knew it" air and quotes the for the consequences evaded. fact of the contract being entered into as "another proof of the Govern ment's sincerity in the matter." This expression suggests the idea that Mr. Mitchell's local organ had been quoting other "proofs" of the Govern such a change could so soon be brought about. The fact is that the Advocate and its friends know very little of the Government's mind in railway or other matters, and they are yet trembling over pending possibilities. their fears by assuring them of our push the whole line through by the belief that Mr. Snowball would build the branch as quickly as possible "provided no unforseen obstacle should present itself." This is seized upon by the Advocate as covering whistles away to keep its courage up.
