NICKEL'S GIFT TO PATRONS.

This afternoon at the Nickel cash prizes, or the equivalent in a Union Bank of Halifax savings book, will be given those children who were secretly photographed by the Nickel's snapshot man as they entered the theatre last Saturday afternoon. If your little boy or only attended the Nickel last

He went again to see the telepathic may. The thing had become an obsession with aim. A sudden idea came to him as the curtain went down on the, third act. He would race the girl to whom the blue gown belonged through the cleaner. He would find her. He would marry her. He had never failed yet in anything he had started out to do. If it took the rest of his life and all his money he would marry that girl.

The cleaner's shop was closed—the bell broken—the blue gown gone. He knocked in vain. No answer came to his summons. He philosophically total his mentangent had been sent home. He would come bettimes in the morning and get the name and address of the girl of the bits gown. Then, for the girl herself!

Thus do the gods delight in checkmating the plans of mortals! On reaching his rooms he found a telegram from his brother in the South, calling him to the plantation in Alabama without delay. "Of greatest importance," the message read. He decided to go the next afternoon, after securing the clue from the cleaner. He could think of no business urgent enough to require his immediate setting forth for Alabama.

He reached for his pipe, scarcely daring to hope that, the Girl would come. She did, with the first puff. She was across the hearth from him. When he started toward her she disappeared. He implored fare to tell him was a cross the hearth from him. When he started toward her she disappeared. He implored fare to tell him when he left."

Billy might have profited by this excellent advice in the days that followed if he had perceived any danger. As it was, Miss Caruthers treated him with frank friendliness, but she showed a distinct preference for the society of young Bob, who trailed devotedly after her on her walks and drives. If Billy was put out at this, he gave no outward indication of that effect.

One rainy day he found Sissy curled up on the sofa in the librarity reading Tennyson. She apologetically held up a very damp handkerchief, and moved over into the corner to hide her pink.

she hady of his dreams. He even fancled that he caught in the tail of her eye a lurking gleam of recognition. He passed on to his section, and went back to his thoughts, which took this had. Tell me," he demanded, "how he passed on to his section, and went back to his thoughts, which took this his."

"See here, old chap, You're in love; and a fellow in love sees in every worman he meets his sweetheart's like, and as fellow in love sees in every worman he meets his sweetheart's like, and as fellow in love sees in every worman he meets his sweetheart's like, and the mood for loving, as the yellow journals say. Now, you are spiritually bound to that blue-gown siri in New York, and it is to her that your thoughts belong. Don't look at the girl yonder any more!" He didn't—until late in the afternoom. He watched her coming down the alsies. She wore a gray gown and black furs. Her ears were plack, her eyelasies long and bronze-tinted. He forced his eyes away from her, and plunged back into his dime magazine and cursed his brother for calling his South.

"At breakfast the following morpring and bronze-tinted. He forced his eyes away from her, and plunged back into hee saws sellm, and in the white shirt-waist she wate at a table across the way. She was slim, and in the white shirt-waist she wore was even more girlish and charming than the day before. Her halr shone in the morning sunits, and charming than the day before. Her halr shone in the morning sunits, and she lingered over her grapefruit, while she propped the morning paper up against the sugar-bowl and devoured the headings. He wondered what her name was. At uncheon he thyew a soy to his sentemental conscience by the last sentement of his force and the head of the last sentement of the morning sunits, and he lingered over her grapefruit, while she propped the morning paper had been considered what her name was.
