CHAPTER VII

Miss Heronworth certainly looked as if she had a very bad headache. "Here you are, darling!" cried Drusilla. "I hoped you were resting. Add Catherine tells me you have been doing your usual morning's work. Why don't you rest a little while. The younger girl took her sister into her arms, and held her caressingly. "You never came to say 'good-night,'" she said. "I waited ever so long, and at last I had to go to sleep. I am so sorry," said Bertha Heronworth.

As she took herself away from her sister's embrace she looked at Drusilla. There was an expression in her eyes which both puzzled and hurt Drusilla.

"I mean Lord Carlingford—is here, and I've asked him to stay to lunch; but you needn't bother to come down. Aunt Edith can chaperone us by the way, Beth," Drusilla added, "she was coming to you; that's why I hurried up to protect you."

"I haven't seen her this morning," said Miss Heronworth. "Catherine kept my door locked; my headache was very bad, but it's almost gone now, and I shall certainly come down to lunch. I want to see Lord Carlingford."

"And he wants to see you," said Drusilla.

The sisters stood an instant looking at one another, then Bertha drew Drusilla to her, and kissed her almost passionately.

"And you are going to be happy— you are going to be very, very happy?"

"I am not going to be," said Drusilla with a little laugh—"I am very happy! Of course, I am not quite used to the idea of belonging to somebody else, but I shall get accustomed to it. It is rather a dear, isn't it, Beth?"

"Uncle Edmund has been telling me that you were going to be married. He is a friend of Lord Southborne, and he has known Carlingford since he was a boy."

"And so Uncle Edmund approves, and the lease can be signed?"

"He is very fond of you, Drusilla, I never realized how much he cared about you until this morning. It seems to me," said Drusilla, "I've got just a little bit too much to make matters just, I ought to share things with some other girl, oughtn't I?"

"If you feel that you have so much, darling," said Bertha, in a low voice, "you can always share with others, and find a joy in doing it."

She did not speak very evenly, and tears seemed to glisten in her eyes.

It was a new thing for Drusilla to see her sister in this nervous, agitated condition. Miss Heronworth was generally so calm, there was about her a seriousness which gave her, as Lord Carlingford had once remarked, a maturity far beyond her years. Today she seemed to have passed through a nerve-storm, to be even at this moment bracing herself up as though to face some ordeal. Though Drusilla did not grasp this fully, she still was sensible that there was about her sister an element which was new to her and disturbing, and as certain ideas flashed suddenly through her mind, she turned to Bertha.
