

The living of such parts of the two tunnels, as are required to be lined with brick work, and the closing of the bottom of the shaft, by strong arches over the tunnel. The stone masonry of the culverts, waste water bridge over Charles river, the road bridge in Needham, and the gate house and pipe chamber, are also completed, with the exception of the building over the gate chamber of the lake, and some other very small portions of work. The bank-filling along nearly the whole of the line is finished. The laying of the iron pipes across the Charles river valley and bridge is rapidly advancing, and will soon be completed; the pipe chambers at each extremity, for securing the connection of the pipes with the brick aqueduct, being already erected.

The tank wall of the Reservoir is very nearly finished, and the entire reservoir is advancing rapidly to completion. It will be ready for receiving the water of Cochichewick lake this autumn. The brick conduit, for conveying the water from the Reservoir to the pipe chamber, independently of the Reservoir, is already finished. The iron main of 30 and 36 inch diameter for conveying the water from the Brookline reservoir to the distributing pipes in the city, and to the two city reservoirs, is fully laid across the railroad bridge in Tremont street, and thence to the Reservoir a distance of one mile, with the exception of a short space at the Roxbury line, a space of a few feet at the gate house, and a short portion of one of the pipes at the crossing of the Boston and Providence railroad. The difficulties of the deep rock cuttings in the Roxbury road, and in the old cuttings in Brookline, which occasioned the necessary obstruction of these roads for a considerable length of time, have been entirely overcome. The roads out of this city will therefore be no longer obstructed.

The laying of the pipes in the city is a great measure completed, with the exception of the small service pipes for the introduction of the water into the premises of individuals. This branch of the work is going on rapidly in the hands of a number of parties of workmen, to the great disturbance of the streets, and frequent obstruction of the gasing in the streets. With the present rate of progress, under the force now employed, the work will be completed in a short time. Pipes laid are now laid for distribution to the houses, except in cases in which the owners or occupants request that iron pipes be used, and in which the intention is to lay pipes of some other material than lead within their premises.

Watering Effects of Yank in Water-Making.—We quote the following paragraph from the Economist newspaper:—It is a positive fact, that throughout Great Britain and Ireland, a quantity of water sufficient to supply the wants of the community is every day destroyed, dissipated, and lost utterly to human use. This is the inevitable result of a wrong system of water-making. A portion of the water, because decomposed by the action of ferrous and other salts, and passes off into the atmosphere in the shape of carbonic acid. As it escapes, it pulls down with it a quantity of oxygen, and the water, being thus deprived of its oxygen, is rendered unfit for drinking. Hence it appears, that in the sack of flour, there is a loss of oxygen, and a gain of carbonic acid, and that there is a difference in favor of bread made without yeast to the amount of 10 lbs. 13 oz. or in other words, that flour would produce 107 loaves of unfermented bread, and only 100 loaves of fermented bread of the same weight.
