We both questioned the lady closely, but her replies did not tend to throw any light upon

The world is looking brighter
When the crop's laid by;
The heart is feeling lighter
When the crop's laid by,
Yon forget the summer's heat
In the fields of corn and wheat
And the reaping song is sweet
When the crop's laid by, There's time for love and laughter
When the crop's laid by—
A kind of glad hereafter
When the crop's laid by.
Each day some joy is bringing;
The sweetest bells are ringing,
And you hear your sweetheart singing
When the crop's laid by. The world—it goes a-Maying
When the crop's laid by;
And every fiddle's playing
When the crop's laid by.
And in the mild sun streaming
The golden rod is gleaming,
And life is love and dreaming
When the crop's laid by.

Of "dress parade" you all have heard,
And, doubtless you have seen
The trampling lines of solid blue
Wheel grandly on the green.
But I've an army which, I'm sure,
Though you look far and near,
Though you hunt north, south, east a
west,
Has not to day a peer.
And every night, at eight o'clock,
Its line of march is made,
And the noise of drums tells me it comes
To give "Undress Parade."

A prouder general than I
Ne'er issued a command;
A prouder army than my own
Exists not in the land.
Two drummers always lead the way,
Then comes the "rank and file."
With heads erect, and faces front,
They march, then halt, the while
I make inspection of them all,
Of uniforms and gunsAnd then I call, "Attention all!"
"Now, march! By twos! By ones!"

At last, when I am satisfied That everything is right; That curls are brushed, and faces clean, That curls are brushed, and faces clean,
And uniforms are white,
I cry out, "Company, break ranks!"
The sound each one alarms;
For straightway, on the "double quick,"
They run into my arms.
The drums are dropped, and muskets, too;
Each hides his curly head,
And hugs me tight, and says, "Good night!"
Then scampers off to bed.
