The story of how the lights were put out, thus probably preventing much loss of life, was a feature of the fire and embraced an act of marked coolheadedness and daring.

Kept Lights Burning.

At the time the lights went out hundreds of people were still in one part or another of buildings. Had the lights remained out permanently many must have lost their way in the smoke and tortuous passages. That they did not was due to the nerve and resource of Fred Wilson, government superintendent of rewiring, and of A. G. Mar-shall, contractor Realizing the necessity of doing something to get the lights on if possible. Mr. Wilson appeal-ed to a sergeant of the 77th for nelp. Mr. Wilson suggested a human chain. Fifty or more men at once volunteered. Mr. Wilson and Mr. Marshall led the way, man after man following in the darkness and smoke, holding each other's hands. Sime 45 men were in line in the tunnel before the door of the electric room was reached. When Mr. Wilson found the handle of the loor in the darkness it was locked It had to be opened, so half a dozen soldiers put their strength against it, and after considerable effort, broke the lock. Mr. Wilson lit a lantern and got old of a pocket torch. The room was empty, there was no sign of the man in charge. Mr. Wilson, on examination, found that fortunately the only trouble was that the main switch had been thrown off, due, he supposed, from the short circuiting of the main circuit of the house of commons. It was only a matter of a few seconds for Mr. Wilson to throw on the switch. In an instant all the lights were on again all over the buildings.
The circuit room was full of smoke.
