THE BRADSTREET COMPANY gathers information that makes the financial position and the controlling circumstances of every maker of merchandise clear. The business is not a mere agency for the merchants, but the merchants. In procuring, packing and forwarding to the customer, the company incurs no reasonable expense. Considered too great, the company will accept the loss of the business. In selecting commercial agents and forwarding orders, the company has the advantage of its own experience and its own resources. In fact, the company is a financial institution, and its business is to make money for its shareholders.
