LAFAYETTE IN AMERICA.

Our cousins across the line have resolved not to forget the memory of the selfish young French nobleman who, in 1778, came to the rescue of the revolted colonies, and contributed not merely the prestige of his name, or even his personal courage, but also his unimpeachable purity and integrity of character to their cause. The Americans do well not to ignore the chivalrous young man—for he was only just of age—who so soon as his Government had signed the treaty with Franklin and his fellow-ambassadors, crossed the Atlantic at his own cost, and risks his fortunes in the cause of revolution. Lafayette was precisely the man to stand by the side of Washington, for in their moral natures they were closely akin. The Frenchman's inferiority was displayed in after years, when his mettle was sorely tried in the fire on a grand scale; but in America his valour was well approved, and his motives were beyond reproach, and his loyalty to the cause he embraced with so much enthusiasm never faltered.

The moral effects of his adhesion to the American banner was even of more importance than the material or intellectual assistance he brought to bear on its side. No leader of men himself, as subsequent events proved, Lafayette, as subordinate to the American chief, was in his right place. Both of them were generals of strong moral fibre, and in grace of manner and cordiality of temper the Frenchman surpassed the American. But he did not possess Washington's presence, his unwearied patience, his strategic skill. Yet this young nobleman, without experience of any sort, was a tower of strength to the revolutionary cause. During that weak period of discord, when the designs of the great chief were in danger of being thwarted by jealousy and impatience, Lafayette never for a moment wavered in his ardent attachment to people he served so faithfully and well. Fortunately it was permitted him to receive in person practical evidence of their gratitude in his old age. Fifty years after he had placed himself by the side of Washington, he once more, now a septuagenarian, crossed the Atlantic to meet with the welcome he deserved from the Americans. During the interval what scenes had he not passed through?

Having carried one revolution to a triumphant issue, he had vainly attempted to stem another one whose tide was too violent and turbid for a hero of his calibre.
With the same devotion to freedom which hurried him across the ocean, he hailed the spirit of revolt in France, only to find that it was a malign, not a beneficient, angel. The court hated him, and yet, when the pitiless storm played about them, he risked all to save the hapless family upon whose heads was poured out the stored vengeance of centuries. When he defied the Paris factions at Ledun, and was compelled to fly to the camp of the allies, he found himself a prisoner at Olmutz, where he was interned for five years. Once again, only four years before his death, he once more figured as commander of Paris during July, 1830, and aided in the third and last revolution he was destined to survive.

Opinions may differ as to his firmness and capacity between 1789 and 1792, but there can be no dispute about the debt due him by the United States of America. That it is not to be passed over at the Yorktown celebration, and that his surviving connections are to witness and participate in the centennial, must be a matter of congratula-tion on all hands. Equally satisfactory is the announcement that French-Canadians will add a new link to the chain between three peoples, temporarily estranged by the fatuousness of rulers a hundred years ago.—

THE YORKTOWN SUR- RENDER.

One hundred years on Wednesday last, Lord Cornwallis and the little army at his command were forced to give up a hopeless conflict on the Yorktown peninsula in Virginia. There was nothing peculiarly glorious to American skill or bravery, nothing dishonourable to the able general who was forced to surrender. The only significance the surrender possesses is owing to its results. It was the beginning of an inevitable end.
No one ever deserved better treatment at the hands of fortune than Lord Cornwallis. With comparatively slender resources he had marched fifteen hundred miles, Savannah and Charlestown had fallen before him, Gates had been utterly overthrown at Camden, and the able Greene at Guilford Court-House. A summons from Clinton, however, recalled Cornwallis to the Virginian sea-board, and he shortly afterwards found himself cooped up at Yorktown, surrounded by a force largely superior to his own. The culpable supineness and delay of his northern colleague left him without hope of relief, and, although he might have held out longer, he finally resolved to surrender rather than witness the complete destruction of his command.

There was nothing heroic about the taking of Yorktown when the circumstances are considered. Little more than a month before the French admiral had beaten off the English squadron, and obtained command of the coast. The parallels about the beleaguered hamlet were drawn by the ablest French engineers, and manned by veteran French soldiers, selected from the flower of the army. The relative proportions of the opposing forces may be terse stated in the language of a new and trustworthy account of the campaign: "On one side was the French fleet, comprising twenty-five ships of the line, carrying 1,700 guns, and 19,000 sailors." On the land side was Rochambeau with French troops aggregating 8,400 men, with 5,600 Continentals under Washington, together with 3,000 militia, who were of less account. Against this military and naval force Cornwallis had 7,500 men within the works of Yorktown. Clearly, therefore, all prospect of relief being hopeless, the surrender was inevitable, and it reflected no dishonour either on the British general or the British name. Lord Cor-wallis was the victim of misfortune reinforced by the incapacity of Clinton. There can be little question that if his rare military abilities had had fair play, the war would have been ended triumphantly in less than a year. Viewed in the light of our own time, we cannot affect to desire that it should have been otherwise than it was.

For this best of reasons no one will grudge the Americans such pleasure as the new centennial can afford them. Time has softened the asperities which were wont to be renewed by revolutionary memories. All has been for the best, and both nations, though owning a separate alliance, may grasp fraternal hands on the banks of the York river. But the memory of the brave Cornwallis is peculiarly British property, and ought not to suffer from forgetfulness in the solitary mischance in which late cast its cold shadow upon the path of a brave man and an able general.

Some men must have a quarter of a column to express a well defined idea, when writing for a newspaper; but it is astonishing how concise they can make an advertisement that costs thirty cents a line.

"Why are you late?" asked an Austin school teacher of a little girl, who hung her head and said, "We have got a little baby at our house." "Don't let it happen again," said the teacher fiercely, and the little girl said she would not and took her seat.—Texas Siftings.

Adam must have been lonesome all alone in the garden, but then his loneliness had its compensations. He had no one to tell him dull and stereotyped stories, nobody to ask him to purchase an elegant serial that should be in every household, nobody to borrow a five-spot from him, nobody to enquire, "Is that hot enough for you?"
Verily, solitude had its charms.
