By RUTH CAMERON.

RUTH CAMERON

It was the foggy end of the winter season, the time of wind and mud and rain, the time of winter sickness and spring-longings, and most important of all, the time of bargains.

The lady-who-always-knows-somewhat had bought herself a pair of shoes. We admired their fine points and then the Authorman's wife put the question that was in our minds, "Were they a bargain?"

"Yes, I think so," said the Lady. "Four dollars."

"Marked down what?"

"From five."

The Authorman's wife, who is a great bargain hunter, laughed at that. "You don't call that a bargain, do you?" she asked. "You ought to see some of the bargains I've seen these last few weeks. Perfectly wonderful."

"Yes, I know," said the Lady, "but the ones that were marked way down didn't fit me or weren't at all what I needed. I thought it was better to save a dollar on something I wanted than two on something I didn't want. After all, a dollar is a very good saving if you get just what you want. It's twenty per cent. If I could save that much on a year's clothes buying it would be about forty dollars. Surely that's worth saving."

Molly Cannot Contain Herself.

Molly, the little stenographer lady, had been listening to the discussion with an air of repressing with difficulty. Do you remember telling me about your friend, Mrs. Martin, who bought the two pairs of five dollar shoes for two dollars and a quarter a pair?" she questioned the Authorman's wife.

"Yes," said the Authorman's wife, "and they were beautiful shoes. That's what I call a bargain."

Molly's eyes danced. "Well, I met her on the trolley yesterday, and we happened to speak of bargains and she told me she had to give one pair away because it didn't fit her. And that made the pair she kept cost her four dollars and a half which is half a dollar more than the Lady paid."

"Well, they were very fine shoes," declared the Authorman's wife lamely, and then she changed the subject which is a way she has at such times.

"Twenty per cent on something you want or fifty per cent on something you don't want. Which is the better bargain? I put it up to you, reader friends."

Every Woman's Duty to Follow the Advertisements.

I am a great believer in following all the sales in the newspaper advertisements and buying at advantage whenever possible. I think that is every woman's duty as the purchasing agent of the family. But I do feel that it is foolish for women to get into their heads that nothing but an enormous reduction is worth while. One sometimes hears the department stores accused of exaggerating values in their advertising. If this is sometimes true who has driven them to this policy? The women who absolutely demand sensational values as the price of their trade.

AN ARTFUL DODGER.

Mr. Balfour is credited with knowing more good stories about the British House of Commons than any other member. One of his best is the following, which he told at a public dinner some time ago:

"I remember hearing of a distinguished gentleman," he said, "who reported in the press gallery just about 100 years ago. He had had an excellent dinner, washed down with excellent wine. He was bored with the debate. He was wearied with the superfluity of rhetoric, which prevailed just as much 100 years ago as today. He got bored and he got up and asked the speaker for a song."

"The speaker of that day was Mr. Addington, a gentleman who was nothing if not proper. The whole House, except the speaker, was convulsed with laughter."

"The sergeant at arms was appealed to. He went to the gallery and he inquired. The culprit retained the presence of mind to point to a respectable and venerable Quaker sitting below him, and this unfortunate gentleman was actually taken into custody."

time elapsed before he was able to make any statement except that he believed he was the only one of the crew of seven who was below when disaster overtook the ship.

When he had completely recovered he told the following story of his terrible experience. I don't know exactly what occurred. I was down below cooking in the fore-cabin. I felt a tremendous surge strike the boat. Then everything went topsy-turvy. I was knocked from end to end of the fore-cabin, and found the floor where the ceiling should be. I could not get out. I did not know what to do, and within a couple of seconds the boat was grating on the rocks inshore. We had turned over so quickly that plenty of air was left in the fore-cabin, so that even if I was imprisoned for a good many hours I still had enough oxygen to keep me going.

Tapping on the Hull.

"As the boat lifted to the swell I could see the light through one of the portholes, and I put out my hand and waved it. Every minute or so the boat dipped beneath the water. I heard tapping outside the hull of the boat. Then someone spoke through the porthole. The voice said: "Where will I cut open the hull?" I indicated this to him, showing him how to keep clear of the stanchions. It seemed hours before I knew anything else. There were fumes of acetylene gas blown into the vessel, and then someone gripped me by the neck and pulled me out of the dark dungeon of the hull, where for a time death seemed to be my only hope of release."

Mr. McRobbie, the rescuer, is very modest about his part, and said that when he saw the man's hand he realized that with the appliances he was acquainted with there was a fair chance of saving life. At all events, he thought it was worth making the attempt; all he would say was that he was glad his effort had succeeded. —The Daily Telegraph, London.

Corns Are Out-of-Date

They Indicate Methods
Which Are Obsolete Now

Folks who have corns are folks who pare them, or use liquids, or some other old-time treatment—ways not up-to-date.

Most folks don't keep corns now. When one appears they apply a Blue-jay plaster. The pain stops instantly. In 48 hours the corn disappears forever.

A famous chemist found this way to end corns without pain or soreness. Now millions use it. Fully half the corns that grow are ended as soon as they appear.

There is no excuse for corns. You can't prevent them, maybe, but you can remove them quickly. There will be no lasting corns on any feet when all folks know of Blue-jay.

Rescued From Upturned Steamer.

A remarkable rescue, the story of which reads like a piece of fiction, was effected at Peterhead recently. That part of the Scottish coast has a sinister reputation amongst seafarers. Our Navy men know it well. It is the most easterly point in the British Isles, and round the corner lies the Moray Firth, affording shelter from the "sonester," the most dangerous of all gales on its ironbound shores.

Saturday morning's storm was the worst for many days. A southeasterly gale sprang up on Friday night, and by the early hours of next morning the conditions were of the wildest description. A salvage craft, the "Salvor No. 1," belonging to a Hull firm, was on its way to the Humber from the north of Ireland, when stress of weather sent it into Peterhead. There is a harbour of refuge, and it lay safely in the shelter of the breakwater until nearly seven o'clock, when daylight had begun to creep in.

Ship Turned Turtle.

The anchors may have begun to drag, but, whatever the reason, the master evidently decided that there was danger in remaining where he was, and he endeavoured to put out to the open sea. As the little craft slowly headed seaward three immense breakers swept down upon her.

The first carried her a considerable distance across the bar, the second engulfed and almost capsized her, and the third sealed her doom, the ship turning turtle and sinking. The waves washed the craft keel up on to a reef of rocks at the other side of the bay, about 300 yards from the land.

All this happened in a few minutes, and, with no sign of life about the craft, the watchers on shore assumed that the crew had been thrown into the sea or carried overboard by the mountainous breakers. Shortly before eight o'clock, however, a hand turned ship, which was facing the beach. The porthole was only a few inches in diameter, and only visible occasionally in the surging surf. It in the water for an hour, made an impossible to rescue the imprisoned sailor, but Francis McRobbie, a young boiler-maker, who has had considerable experience of mechanics and gases in America, thought an attempt might be made to cut through the iron hull by the use of the blowpipe.

He accordingly got two cylinders, one of oxygen and the other of acetylene, through the two-inch steel plate, and ultimately effected a rescue, which is probably without a parallel. It was the ship's cook, E. J. E. Riches, hailing from Yarmouth, who owed his life to this ingenious and skilful blacksmith.

A great crowd had gathered opposite the scene, and followed the operations of McRobbie and his assistants with intense interest. It was a fight against both time and tide, for the sea was rising. When the poor fellow was on cheer was raised, and rescued and rescuer were the heroes of the hour. Riches, was, as may be imagined, in a dazed and weak state, and some

NEATNESS A BEAUTY ASSET.

This is indeed an age of haste and hurry, of grime and dust, of smoke and clinders. This cogitation is not it takes time to rid one's self of the grime which is so quickly and easily accumulated.

Yet if one would look well in her everyday attire or in those fine, fresh, new togs which are so alluring, she must be sure to allot herself all the time necessary for the cleansing and airing and sunning which shall make her as sweet as a rose.

The girl taught and trained, month after month, and year after year, that is a disgrace to appear in anything but spotless neckwear; in gloves which are not clean; in tailored clothes which lack the pressing iron; in shoes run over at the heel or with buttons gone or laces not as they should be; with teeth which do not bespeak the use of dental floss, a good brush and powder; with hair which is caught up anyway at all—this girl, trained as I have said, in all of these things, will be bound to be thought attractive, even though she should not be beautiful, according to ideals seen upon calendars and magazine covers.

She will, indeed, not only make but retain a good impression wherever she goes, while the pretty girl who is slightly slovenly and careless will be passed over unnoticed by her side.

Ozone can never possess a substitute. Sun and air are good for not only well washed clothes but for well washed hair. It is good for the hair that has been worn a good deal, for the waist which has seen service, for the workaday skirt, for the stays, for all the articles of clothing.

Things which can go into a tub, of course, get their required amount of sun and air, but things which cannot be tubbed, scalded, ironed and well dried should at least have an air and sun bath whenever occasion offers.
