The sad issue came, and the distracted youth stood, with a shattered heart, by his dead wife and her dead babe. When the dear forms were committed to the dust, he wandered to other lands, for the double purpose of having his grief assuaged and concaing it from his mothers eyes. When he returned he was able to command his feelings, and appear composed, but deep, deep, sorrow was his in heart, and all the heavier that it was scruphously concelled there, and cherished in secret. It was, he deemed, unknown to all; he was therefore denied all sympsthy, and, to find relief from the burden of his woe, he engaged with zest in all manner of outdoor sports, seeking in the excitement and physical energy required by these to forget the past, or at least to make its memory less bifter and sad.

Time were on, and this course confirmed itself in this thearty, jovial character we have seen stateding to the Baronet. He had been educated according to his class and time, but he allowed his education to rust. He would were use no other language than the broad Doric, and eventually prided himself in speaking it in the full breadth of its native purity. These habits, of course, grew upon him with years, till he became just such as we have found him figuring in our story. Time, of course, healed the wound in his heart, but the scar thereof never departed, and at times, when no eye was upon it, he would feel trender some. He was no true to many the search of the sear

Nor so DANGEROUS—The Malestrom of our childhood's grographies is as much a myth as that described by Edgar A. Poe. A late report on the Norwegian fisheries says that it is so little thought of by the inhabitants that they pass and repass it in their frail vessels at all states of the tide, except at certain times in the winter season; and, far from drawing in whales and other things that come within its range, appears to be a favorite resort of the fish of the vicinty; and the fishermen reap a rich piscatorial harvest from its bosom. The greatest rate of the tide in winter does not exceed six mites an hour. Well, let unfeeling science give up the maelstrom; but poetry and rhetoric will will yield their faith in it only when they cease to believe in Scylla and Charybdis.
