

of him. Sleeping visions first, mostly waking dreams at last. That boy's father was a radical weaver hanged at York. Perhaps a well-meaning and very unfortunate man. My people are nearly all radicals, or chartists; well-meaning, intelligent, industrious. Only a very few are so wicked as to talk of violence, bloodshed, revolution. Simon Lud was a man of violence. He was executed. Perhaps the law was too severe. Still that was the doom. The parish nursing, Toby, had this evil reputation attaching to his family. You must be infatuated, Agnes, to see visions of him in sleep, and encourage waking dreams. Let the dreams cease."

"They should indeed cease. If he be Lud they shouldn't have begun, I suppose. If he be—a very different person, as the visions represent him, I should not dream."

"You dream now, Agnes; what very different person may he be?"

"Eustace De Lacy Lillymerel the lost heir of Earl Royalfort."

"Agnes! Agnes Schoolar! Does your father know of that dream?"

"Never hinted to human being until now."

"How could this be?"

"I know not, dear lady. Oh, look not, speak not, look not severely!"

"Agnes, this requires care and silence from you; demands from me instant departure on the quest proposed."

"Take me with you, Lady Mary. I'm miserable—miserable! Take me! Make me one of the hundred maidens!"

"Impossible, dear Agnes. It would be a breach of sacred trust, and outrage on your parents. A disobedience in you, forfeiting the favour of Heaven. In me an offence to conscience and Heaven. Entreat not again, dear Agnes, but return home. Did Toby declare love for you?"

"He never spoke; but—I do not know. He was very beautiful, and looked at me."

"Return home, Agnes. Confide private feelings about Adam to father and mother, and cease dreaming of Toby. They may see a way of escape; but I dare not be an accomplice without permission."

"Will you assist my escape from Adam, if father and mother desire it? Will you, Lady Mary? Will you?"

"Write to me in America. If under your father's own hand I be permitted to receive you, I shall, most willingly."

"So happy! So happy! I'll throw myself at father's feet; cling to his knees; tell how I shudder and breathe death in presence of bad Adam. And father will pity me and relent; I think he will. Of mother she agrees with him in everything."

"I proceed to-morrow, Agnes; and at Liverpool become one of Isa Eliqueter's hundred maidens. She knows me only by name. I sent a donation to her funds, saying an elderly, somewhat elderly person well recommended, would join her band of girls; one Mary M. Ester. Take the name and address. Tell not any one that this is Lady Mary Mortimer. I assume a part of a remote ancestral name. Take it down carefully: 'Mary M. Ester; care of the Postmaster, Conway, Canada.' Bless you, dear Agnes! Bless you!"

Next day they parted, Agnes returning to London.

Liverpool told New York that a ship had sailed with a hundred maidens.

New York flashed forth that the wind was fair, for the ship on the sea with the maidens.

Newspapers announced that a ship was coming—a ship with a loading of helps.

Quebec called to Montreal; Montreal to Upper Canada, that the ship had arrived; the ship with Isa Eliqueter and a hundred servant girls.

Of the girls, one was Mary M. Ester. She went on to Conway. Three weeks later the Conway magistrate gave this deliverance:

"Mary M. Ester: you are one of those idle, useless, vagrants who ought not to have come to this country. Committed to the common gaol for thirty days."

(To be continued.)

It is said that Don Fabian Hernandez, of Santander, a well-known bibliophile, is about to publish a new edition of "Don Quixote," from the original manuscript of Cervantes, which he has had the good fortune to discover, and which he purposes reproducing in its integrity free from the corruptions which have crept into the text by accident or design.

It is proposed to supply the public, through the medium of a Joint Stock Company, with a class of carriages such as are common in the principal cities of Europe and America.

This Company proposes to ply for hire Cabs, Carriages, Broughams, Hansoms, Coupes, Omnibuses, &c.

The Drivers will wear a plain, serviceable livery, becoming their respectable avocation.

The patronage of the public will be sought for and secured by every attention to their comfort and convenience.

This Company has secured the valuable and exclusive right of stationing their Cabs and Omnibuses at the Grand Trunk Depot.

From carefully prepared estimates it may be safely affirmed that, with careful management, the business of this Company will prove largely remunerative to the shareholders.

Application for the remaining Shares to be made to
