Reasonable terms should include as a first condition an amnesty; and next, if independence is surrendered, that there shall be some substantial security for the interests of the Dutch people.—Sir W. Harcourt's letter to The Times, Nov. 13, 1901.

By reasonable terms I mean terms which include some provision for the restoration of the people to their farms, the grant of an amnesty at the conclusion of the war—(Lord Lansdowne: A monstrous proposal)—the promise of self-government at a comparatively early date ... and, of course, the withdrawal of the threats of banishment and confiscation of property which are now being made.—Mr. Bryce, House of Commons, Aug. 15, 1901.

The Boer leaders have not modified their attitude. They still require absolute independence. This, according to his own account, was General Botha's first demand at the Middleburg interview with Lord Kitchener.
