NOTES AND NEWS.

Small Industries and productions sometimes yield handsome profits. Nantucket, Mass., having given up the pursuit of the great whales which once made her so famous, is not ashamed to pursue smaller game, and at the last of November till, to the last she exported 2,333 barrels of opened clams, worth $20,907.

I leave of the affection of a mule. It is not to be trusted. A savage beast that uncertain species and an idiot boy at Georgetown, D. C. had contracted an intimacy with each other surpassing the love of women just out of boarding school. None but the idiot boy could control the beast, but he led him by the halter of love. At last they had a falling out, and the vicious brute kicked and stamped the poor boy to death. Moral: Put not your trust in mules.

O, now, this is rather too much. W. dote on sagacious dogs, and will believe anything in reason about them, but when a Naubah, N. H., paper tells of a canter that accompanied his master from his shop to a remote building, and when he heard him muttering that he had been a key, rushed back to the shop, hunted on the right key from a large assortment and galloped back with it, the story gives us pause. It may be so, but we would like to see it somewhere besides in a Naubah paper.

A Mr. Little, of Randolph, Vt., who has a luxuriant head of hair and a full heavy beard, was surprised a few days ago to find these advantages suddenly taking leave, and in a week his pate was as smooth as a billiard ball. As his health was impaired he was unwilling to undergo and calls frantically upon the doctors and philosophers to account for the mysterious disappearance of his hair. We are a philosopher, but before gratefully his hair will we must know whether he has a wife, mother-in-law, and other relatives by marriage, and what their record has been.

It is curious to notice how Germans have come to consider lager beer as a necessary of life. Thus the Cincinnati that city are strongly advocating the sale of lager at three cents per glass, instead of the present rate of five cents. The Volksblatt makes a remarkable comparison. It says: "A common working man drinks eight glasses daily, at a cost of 40 cents, or $2.50 per week." Should the price be lowered to three cents, the expense would be 24 cents, it never occurs to this paper that the common laboring man might drink no beer at all and save the whole.

GENERAL.
About the thinnest sample of a sensation about ever invented is that set on foot by the Paris Figaro, to the effect that Napoleon III. is not dead, but travelling about France, testing the feelings of the people, while the corpse which was interred at Chislehurst is a mere dummy. The individual who conceived this brilliant fiction must esteem the millions of the world according to his distinctive standard. His brain would afford an interesting study under the microscope.

The condensing simplicity of some folks is quite charming. They are apt to lose by it peculiarly, but guilelessness of soul is more to be desired than great riches, and it is no doubt a recommendation to be gulled than to be familiar with the snares of the wicked world. This is approved by two or three little anecdotes. A trustful woman of Providence accepted the invitation of a Boston stranger to purchase a new-made friend in Boston $75, the other day, to satisfy the opportunities of an impromptu creditor. This lady had a stock raiser from Iowa was lately in Omaha where he had on his picture card of the monte man to the extent of $700, and lost his money. And so on.

About Dresses, Dress Goods, and Style.
The fashion editor of the N. Y. Mail gives the ladies much good advice. She discusses the dress question as follows: Too much money is often frittered away over flimsy and showy materials, or upon an excess of trimming, which might have been invested to fasten good material in garments of plain aspect but of real value. One thing is good material is worth three or four costumes of inferior texture. An invaluable rule for the purchase of dry goods is to buy only the best of everything. If you cannot afford a good silk at three or four dollars a yard, to purchase a good Irish or French poplin at half those sums is better than to invest in a poor silk.

If something still lower in price than the poplins is desired, do not purchase a poor imitation poplin but look among the beautiful alpacas, or mohairs, for something which will do good service, and at the same time combine beauty with utility.

The next important step after making the purchase of a dress, is of course to have it properly made; for, be the material ever so costly, an ill-fitting dress is always a failure—since it can never give satisfaction to the wearer—and many an otherwise elegant garment has been ruined in the making. One of the modern vices of dressmaking is the outrageous taste displayed in superfluous trimming. Such an indescribable amount of ruffles and bouffes, of platings and folds, of laces and fringes, as one poor, unfortunate robe of the period is called upon to support, is a violence against every known law of beauty and taste. In matters of dress nothing can be more beautiful than the long flowing lines, the exquisite drapery in vogue among the ancients, and the nearer we assimilate our dresses to such models the nearer do we come to the perfection of art in dress.

How incomparably more beautiful is a long, rich robe, falling in graceful folds around the figure, than one of those distorted costumes, so cut up in infinitesimal pieces to be sewed up again, that give scarcely know what when to give garment when finished! That simple word robe has lost its primitive significance, and in place of it we have basques, polonaises, overskirts and undersirts, and so on, to the bewilderment of the eye and the wearying of the mind.

To combine simplicity with elegance in dress is to attain the most potent secret of the toilette.

Here is a California Romance.

In that memorable year of '49, a young man named Badger started out from his home in New York in search of a fortune. "Never drink or gamble, my boy," were the parting words of his widowed mother as her only son stepped over the threshold. In company with half a dozen Arizonans Badger started for California. Almost immediately upon arriving there he started into the mountains. Big luck attended every venture, and in a short time he was a rich man. He entered into partnership with one of his companions, but finding that he was getting swindled he withdrew from the firm and went to San Francisco to deposit his gold-dust in the Mint. He received certificates therefor and went back to the mountains. But he struck a bad streak. Bad luck attended him wherever he went. For nineteen years he knew no rest in his migrations. Ever money, and without fortune at every mining camp he went to, and always striving to better himself by a change of location, he soon became a fit rival for the wandering Jew. Finding that luck was still against him, he resolved to go to San Francisco and take his gold-dust from the Mint. He could not go in his hand and with difficulty wrote out a certificate for both, and he returned during the remainder of their lives. The Mint was found, and the certificates presented in as good condition as when he had first received them, nineteen years before. The astonishment of the clerk may easily be pictured. For identification the old man gave the names of some of those who had made deposits at the same time that he had, and also took a receipt from all such records, and addressed a light note to each of them.
