(Limited) -OF-The ball is at its height. The first small 8 hour of morning has sounded. The band is playing dreamily, sweetly; flowers are nodding everywhere, some emitting a dying fragrance, others still fresh and sweet as when first plucked. Afar off the faint splashing of the fountains in the conservatories echoes tremulously, full of cool imaginings, through the warms air. JAMES TIBBITS. Boots and Shoes [Hatheway & Co.'s Report, July 14th-] THE KEY TO HEALTH. To select from in the City at -: ARRIVE AT FREDERICTOR conservatories echoes tremulously, tuil of yool imaginings, through the warm air.

Music, and laughter, and mirth—real and unreal—are mired together in one harmonious whole.

Mrs. Steyne has now an unaffected Mrs. Steyne has now an unaffected smile upon her face, being assured her ball is an undeniable success, and is allowing herself to be amused by Taffy, who is standing close beside her.

Tom Steyne, who like Sir Charles Coldstream is "thirty-three and used up," is in a corner, silently miserable, suffering himself to be firted at by a gay young thing of forty. He has been making despairing agas to Taffy to come to his assistance for the past five minutes, which signate ordistress that young gentleman basels declines to see.

Every one is busy asking who Mrs. Arilington can be, and, as nobody knows, everybody undertake st to tell his or her neighbor "all about her." "Oh poor Tom! De look at Tom and that fearful Miss Dumaresque," says Mrs. Steyne, who just at this moment discovers the corner where Tom is doing his utmost to "suffice and be strong." It is, however, a miserable attempt, as he is visibly depreased and plainly on the point of giving way altogether. "Somebody must go to his succor," says Mabel, with decision: "the question is, who? You, my dear Taffy, I think."

"Not I," says Taffy; "please, dear Mrs. Steyne, do not afflict me so far. I couldn't indeed. I am very dreadfully afraid of Miss Dumaresque; besales I never pity Tom gren when in his worst scrapes.
