

night glare was a beacon for the mariner.

Within a few days, Fleming had seen everything. He had seen the new Mercantile, Maritime, Produce, Metal, Horse, Stock and other Exchanges; the new Banks and Bank Clearing House; the new Post Office, with its pneumatic dispatch system operating from various parts of the City and with its eleven branch offices and over a score of sub-stations; the new skyscrapers; the new manufacturing district between Bay and Bathurst streets; the new Railway Depot, capacious and complete and possessing every convenience and comfort known to travellers; the new Fire Stations; and many other modern buildings.

He had heard of the great water-works undertaking; the laying of the main from Lake Simcoe to Toronto; the continued annexation of
