VANCOUVER:

FROM A COMMERCIAL

STANDPOINT.

The development of the great resource of British Columbia and the Yukon is of importance to Canada from a commercial and industrial standpoint. There is no means of measuring the increase of population which would result therefrom, but we do not believe they are at all extravagant who say that when the Pacific slope of Canada is in full swing the people engaged in it and the other industries of the Coast will exceed a million, nor do we think it unreasonable to expect this number to be reached within a decade. Oregon and Washington added nearly three-quarters of a million to their population in ten years, and those states, great in natural wealth though they are, cannot be ranked with British Columbia and the Yukon. In saying this we do not forget that we do not possess, north of the international boundary and west of the Rocky Mountains, such a wheat-growing area as the two states named contain, or that they have a larger extent of country suitable for fruit culture. But putting these aside, the Canadian territory in question is their equal in every other respect, and excels them so much in some respects as to surpass them in the aggregate. We have a greater area of timber lands; our pasture lands are more extensive; we believe a careful computation would show that we possess more land suitable for dairying and mixed farming; our fisheries are more extensive; our coal mines larger and of much more value; our decomparably greater. From a purely commercial point of view, that is in quite, two thousand people have passed the summit of the pass, beyond which view of the growing commerce of the through Victoria on their way to the the United States never made the slight-Pacific, our geographical position is fully Northern gold fields of Canada.
