It wasn't a ball game. The thing should have been announced as a burlesque, and maybe so many people wouldn't have gone away disgusted before the performance was half-over. There was a good attendance, and the crowd expected the Cockneys to put up a good enough game to at least make the Western Leaguers try a little bit. They were disappointed.

Price was in the box for London. It can scarcely be said that he pitched. He did succeed in hitting two batters on the head. He almost struck out Buelow by hitting him on the side of the head with a pitched ball. It laid Buelow flat on the ground, and the spectators were beginning to feel sick and uncomfortable when Dungan stood up and began to count Buelow out. "One—two—three—four," he counted after the manner of an accomplished prizefighter. Buelow sat up, and assisted to his feet, and staggered off to first base. Good humor was restored. The burlesque had just missed being a tragedy.

But Price didn't like his comedy role. The fans, who almost from the beginning had been calling for Seiver, Cooper, Babbitt, anybody but Price, began to roast him unmercifully. Some of them made unkind, personal remarks, and Price, exasperated, started for the grand stand with blood in his eye. Lohman stopped him, and reminded him that he was doing the heavy villain part in a burlesque melodrama, and that he shouldn't regard the remarks as personal at all, but merely as a tribute to his art.
