FUUN CUPY

When nature made the twins, cy and Sara Knight, she blunded in haste or carelessness, or won't you?" pleaded the other, with wet eyes and trembling mouth. "He will at the first opportunity. He said so. And he is so doubtful of your feelings that a slight rebuff will drive him away from the subject. You see, Lu, you never had an offer and don't understand by the time the children were six months old. When they were grown, it was a standing jest in a community just then addicted to "Pinafore" that the facetious mother or you will lose him to a dead eer wasted words.

won't you?" pleaded the other, with exercise, when the ceremony was over, came the twin sisters. Sara leaned upon the arm of her lately wedded husband, as arch and piquant as ever. Lucy was in the escort of a perfunctory usher. who was slightly afraid of her.

"I congratulate you, Mr. Hyde," she said, in her low, rich monotone, looking him direct in the eyes. She could not say less. She never wasted words. er of us all had "mixed these maid-ensup."

Their twinship seemed absurd, even to casual acquaintance. Not a feature or trick of tone or manner betrayed it. Lucy was a tall brugette and June square in huild.

A wave of color, so faint that best friend described as a "volcano shut up in an iceberg," once spoke to me of his "agony of incommunicableness."

Let these where clearly formula to the color of the color walked as queens should; her contralt voice had a sub-tone of repressed passion, so consistent with the trite propriety of her speech. the trite propriety of her speech, that people were surprised and provoked when they could elicit nothing else. She looked like a Medea whose very calms were deadly, and portended tempest. Her family knew her as an amiable pack-horse, her friends as the meekest and shyest of social lay figures, conscientious to a fault, patient to a miracle.

"You have no more character"

Sara stared at her in intensest scorn.

"If I say another word I'll be sorry for it," she uttered in desponsible, practical fellow and very much in love with his second choice.

"The volcano is the work of your imagination, my pet. Or, if you are in the right, life is too short to be spent in thawing a thousand feet of ice upon the chance of finding fire at the bottom."

Her hair would have been flaxen but for the golden glints upon the waves; her lips cherry ripe; her cheeks had the violet flush, at once soft and clear, one revels over in the heart of a Katherine Mermit.

Was like her voice in speaking—mechanical, yet holding vague into mations of an imprisoned soul.

The brilliant little blonde had an inspiration, and a bit of swift telegraphy went on behind Lucy's back. Neither of the respondents thought of the mirror, in which the dumb show was repeated.
