SHERLOCK HOLMES IN HARNESS.

The German Editor and Wrych of the Baddet Court.

It was a hot day.

The sun seemed to shrivel the guiding off the gleaming sign of the "Blarearter," the leading government paper in the eighth city of Germany. A barefooted newboy ran among Grubb street calling "Blarearter for a penny," trying to get rid of his wares at half price.

Inside the big newspaper office, in the little editorial sanctum two men were conversing earnestly. From underground depths a voice with a strong provincial accent frequently broke out into what the eighth city supposed to be a popular Scotch song. A traveling minstrel show had left behind them the catch.

"O Gille Land, sweet Gille Land, 'Where saints and sinners stand, 'O Gille Land!"

Above the editor's desk the features of Pastor Weider, a by-gone political divine looked down sternly, one would say almost disapprovingly. Opposite was a framed motto worked in creeds. "Ded British be Jerkin," which expressed the Boer war views of one of the editor's recent predecessors.

"Mr. Holmes," said the editor, "what are you doing?"
