

FRANCIS &
VAUGHAN,
19 KING STREET.

We have spoken of the emergency. The emergency appears to be so apparent that it seems almost a waste of time to dwell upon it. I have already had the statements of the Prime Minister of England, of the First Lord of the Admiralty, the man who probably has a better idea than any other of them of the conditions of the naval affairs are concerned, of the Foreign Secretary and others within and without the Government, and they all say that the time has not yet come for any in this House, who have not had an opportunity and never will have probably of being intimate with the Government, to reach these gentlemen whom I have named, to impute, to question the information which they give us? They know far better than we do that the royal navy is the best in the world, that the fleet is the greatest, that the ships are the strongest, and they know what they have to prepare for. There is no doubt in regard to Germany, Germany is a country which has no doubt a very complete military history proves that. It has made itself the dictator of Europe, and now it is trying to make itself, through the supremacy of the seas, dictator of the world. Let us read the statement taken from a letter written on the 18th of March last by Sir Frederick Harrison, who is a well known public man, has been a member of the Government on one side or the other, and who has been a consistent anti-militarist. Speaking of Germany Mr Harrison said:

"The German navy is not built for distant voyages. It is built only to act various portions of this Empire, a that we may look forward to the real zation in the future of that dream which I have spoken already, where these great countries, as they will be in time these populous countries bound together by ties of interest and blood and affection and sentiment shall become the greatest galaxy of nations in the world, able not only to protect ourselves from injury, but to uphold the peace of the world.
