LLOYD GEORGE AND DUKE OF SUTHERLAND

The first enthusiasm for Lloyd George's land proposals is being followed by a wave of criticism of the Duke of Sutherland's offer to sell his deer forests. Even though he has asked extravagant terms, it has served to show that deer lands are largely impracticable, owing to impoverishment of the soil, for maintaining a population. While large land owners have proved unexpectedly sympathetic a large number of smaller interests that will be affected are in arms. Town tradesmen who have invested in rural land and farmers who are jibbing at the minimum agricultural wage are consolidated with the opposition forces. Many of the best agricultural authorities gravely doubt the economic possibility of bringing the light lands into full bearing, as Lloyd George proposes. Debates and discussions during the past three weeks have clearly brought out the fact that most agricultural land is not over-rented, land-owners obtaining very low interest on investment, being content with the territorial glory which still attaches to land ownings. There is even now a possibility of vital parts of the scheme—afforestation, cheap cottages, low agricultural freight rates, security of tenure and minimum wage for laborers—being ultimately carried by a concerted movement of both parties. Meanwhile, a considerable section of the younger Unionists, including many of the cleverest men in the party, are showing in many ways their unrest under the present negative policy of the opposition. They paint as their ideal Disraeli's notion of a Tory democracy. They ask for a positive Unionist housing, land reform, social betterment campaign. Bonar Law has apparently had his hands tied by a reactionary section which includes great county influences.—Exchange

THE RURAL COMMUNITY

If any of those interested in rural work in America should chance to read what here is written, we suggest to them that what is wanted in rural America, as it is wanted in Ireland, is the creation of rural communities. The society for one purpose only, the credit society, the agricultural society, the co-operative factory, organized separately, only bring people into contact at one point, and the unity created is not strong enough or vital enough to have much effect on character. They help to bring about individual prosperity, but what is really wanted in the countryside is to create the rural community, with its human interests as fully catered for as its economic interests. Unless the countryside can offer to young men and young women some satisfactory food for soul as well as body, it will fail to attract or hold its population, and it will go to the already overcrowded towns, and the lessening of rural production will affect production in the cities and factories, and the problem of the unemployed will get still keener. Already in England, a country industrially like the United States, they are hoping to seal the flow of life from the country to the towns by artificially raising wages by legislation. It is a vain hope. Man does not live by cash alone, but by every gift of fellowship and brotherly feeling which society offers him. The final urgings of men and women are towards humanity. Their desires are for the perfection of their own life, and as Whitman says, where the best men and women are, there the great city stands though it is only a village. It is one of the illusions of modern materialistic thought to suppose that as high a quality of life is not possible in a village as in a great city, and it is one of the aims of rural reformers to dissipate this illusion and to show that it is possible, not, indeed, to concentrate wealth in country communities as it can be concentrated in great cities, but that it is possible to bring comfort enough to satisfy any reasonable person and to create a society where there will be intellectual life and human interests. We will hear little then of the rural exodus. The country will retain and increase its population and its productivity. Like attracts like, life draws life to itself, intellect awakens intellect, and the country will hold its own, tug for tug with the towns.—Irish Homestead.
