The Two Homes.

Two homes are in sight of each other In a green little vale that I know, One a mansion as fair as a palace, One a cottage in groves nestled low. The housewife in one ever singeth, Though her good man is often away, In the other the lady is silent, With her lord at her side every day.

And the woman down there in the cot

Cottageward with a tear in her eye.
And oft, when her l-rd at his pastime
Or a stroll through his acres is seen,
This lady will steal to the paling
That standeth the gardens between.

She never would cross the brief limit,
She is proud and her station is pat,
While the woman beyond it is humble,
And vulgar, and poor, and all that;
But my lady down there at the paling
Just bends her proud ear to the line
And listers in lip parted silence.
As though for a choir of the Nine.

My bey, when you go out a camping don't "rough it" too much. Don't go without tents. A camp without a tent is like an orehard without apples. And don't move into a hotel cottage and call it "camping." That is about as much like camping as paying a dollar a pound and fishing in a stocked fish pond is like trout fishing. Take a tent, the army wall tent is the most comfortable, and enjoy yourself. The guide book will tell you, as it told us, that a tent is unnecessary. That "the outhor and his friends have camped in the Adirondacks, sleeping in the open air every night, for," I forget whether it was three months or three years, and never felt a drop of rain.
