A Heroic Deed. By the sudden rising of the water in a Comstock mine, seven men were imprisoned at the head of a drift two thousand feet below the surface of the ground. Water stood in the drift to within a few inches of its crewn, and the remaining space was filled with poisonous gases. The men had been there for many hours, and the superintendent of the mine said that they must have died. A rapping was heard on the iron pipes leading to the head of the drift, but this was to the head of the drift, but this was explained at being caused by the falling of stones upon the iron after they had been released by the action of the water.
