Daring Explorers Reach Sydney

FROM THE FROZEN NORTH.

Prof. McMillan, who accompanied Commander Peary on his trip to the pole, arrived in the city this morning from a three months cruise to northern Labrador. The object of the expedition was principally ornithological and ethnological work. Prof. McMillan was accompanied by Mr. J. C. Small, a New Englander.

The trip, which covered over 2600 miles and lasted just about three months, was made in a tiny motor boat.

It was built by Mr. Small, is 25 feet in length, with a 7 ft. 7 in. beam. She was originally intended for the Crockerland expedition which was to have left here for the north on the 29th day of July of this year, but which was postponed for a year, on account of the death of Prof. McMillan's co-partner, Prof. Geo. Borup, by drowning in a boating accident at his home in Maine.

She was intended to be used principally in walrus fishing and, so carries an engine of 1,700 pounds, 12 horse power, for the heavy hauling of the walrus to land, there to be cut up for the 120 dogs to have been taken with the aforesaid expedition. The engine, which is made to use either gasoline or kerosene is capable of 8 hours of work. The boat is heavily iron sheathed on the outside for steaming through ice, and staunchly timbered, so that she is able to stand a lot of knocking about. She is lined also with tanks capable of carrying 200 gallons of gasoline or kerosene.

Shortly after his arrival here this morning, a Post reporter had a most interesting talk with the explorer on the season's trip. The story is, in brief as follows:—

"We sailed from Sydney, myself and Mr. Small, on June 24th, steaming up St. Paul's Island, thence to Cape Ray and thence to the coast of Labrador to Battle Harbor, and on reaching this latter port on July 6th, found it blocked heavily with drift ice from the Arctic. We were forced to remain here some time. Leaving there about July 7th we turned north again and for three solid days forced our way through closely packed drift ice. Not once, however, in spite of this did our engine give us any trouble, nor did we sustain any injury to the hull. In fact, throughout the whole trip, although the season was an unusually bad one, and our boat almost a mere cockle shell, we had not one serious mishap.

"After about three or four days steaming north from Battle Harbor reaching Cape Harrison, we passed into clear water, and did not again encounter ice.

"At Hopdale, the second Moravian Mission station on the coast, and a little south of Davis Inlet, we were met by Mr. A. C. Bent, of Tauern, Massachusetts, who had left for Newfoundland and the Labrador about the first of June. His chief object there was the study of the ptarmigan. He accompanied us as far north as Cape Mugford, where he left us for the south again on the 11th.

"Seldom if ever have I seen such storms on the Labrador coast as we experienced this summer. Soon after leaving the ice at Cape Harrison, we encountered dirty weather and for seventeen days battled with the storms. That, however, was only fun and served to break the monotony.

"On our trip north, we visited a number of Moravian Mission stations, among which were Makovik, Hebron, all in Labrador. We counted at these stations about 200 Esquimaux, for the most part Christians. We spent some time among these people, engaging in ethnological work, such as the measurements of the skulls of the inhabitants, etc. We measured about 140 Esquimaux.

"The farthest point north which we obtained was Hebron, 50 degrees 30 minutes, north latitude. We had also intended to pay a visit to the Indians of the interior, which are a people altogether different from the Esquimaux, hostile and cruel. However, owing to the fact that we waited for some time for some friends from the States to join us in the trip to the interior, and who finally did not come, we had to call off this part of our trip.

"On the down trip we had fairly good weather, reaching Battle Harbor soon after the first of September. We stored the boat there, where we will call for it next year on the Crockerland expedition.

"Altogether we travelled this summer 2600 miles. Our work was done principally for Harvard University and the American Museum of Natural History."

Questioned as to this expedition the Professor explained:

"As you know, this expedition was to have left this port about the last of July of this year, under command of the late Professor Borup and myself, but, owing to his untimely death, was postponed till 1913.

"As far as I can tell at present the Crockerland expedition will leave Sydney in July, 1913, on the Diana, a vessel somewhat smaller than the old "Rosevelt." Among the party will be a geologist, geologist, a hydrographer, or mapmaker, and the whole party of about fifteen, will be dropped in Crockerland. The Diana will then come south, returning for us in 1915.

"The first year of the Expedition will be consumed in an attempt to discover a new land in the polar sea, which Peary claims to have seen, and named in 1906. As no new land is accepted by science until someone has set foot upon it, and has determined its latitude and longitude. From a study of Arctic tides, it would indicate that there are about half a million square miles of land, still unknown, in the north and it is supposed that Peary saw a corner of this.

"The second year we penetrate the interior of Greenland, for although the north and south are fairly well known, the remainder is unexplored. It is understood that some peaks in the interior here are about 12,000 feet high, and some of these altitudes we will attempt to reach. We will return, if all goes well, in the fall of 1915, hoping to have found out a great deal more than we now know."

Prof. McMillan leaves shortly for his home in the States.
