PLIGHT OF FLORA—A SORROWING MOTHER-OVERTAKEN BY IAN.

the face, on which yet lingered traces of great beauty.
Flora's attention became rivetted on her, and she felt her heart goout towards her in sympathy before yet she knew aught of her, save that she was a woman like herself, and one who had seen affliction. Her dress was scanty, was faded, tattered and torn. In her arms, tightly clasped to her breast, was the appearance of a child, muffled up in the folds of an old shawl.

She seemed to much fatigued—yea old shawl.

She seemed to much fatigued—yea, worn out and, exhausted—for when within the clump of trees, and not many yards from our heroine, her limbs faltered, and tottering forward, she sank upon the ground. But as she was speaking—unconscious that human was near—and Flora eagerly listened to the words which fell from her lips. She spoke in the Lowland tongue, with a sweet and tender accent—

Lowland tongue, with a sweet and tender accent—

"And has it come to this," she wailed.
"God knows, perhaps it is better that it is so. To die here will not be without its cheerful side. The music of the dashing stream, and the merry, gladsome songs of the joyous birds will fall eweetly upon my waning senses as the everlasting shadow closes over me. Everlasting! nay; in the Temple of the Almighty beyond surely the grief and the misery which have been my lot here will exist not even in memory. Surely all darkness and dread will then be put away, and this poor soul refreshedwith deepdraughts of the love of the Great Author of its spirit. If not, why—oh why was I ever born?

"And my child, my child; my bonnia."

of the love of the Great Anther of its spirit. If not, why—oh why was I ever born?

"And my child, my child; my bonnie wee Jeannie, how can I leave you?" As she spoke, she unwrapped the shaw from the babe at her breast—a fair chubby child, of from one to two years of age. It was asleep, and the fond young mother, after gazing carnestly, with tearful eyes, into its sweet upturned face, impressed a passionate kiss upon the white brow, and sobbed aloud.

"Oh, my darling babe, I would willingly live and toil and suffer for you; but, alas! it is too late now to think of it. What can I do? In the wilds, starving, worn out by fatigue I have come here to die, because I feel it to be easier than continuing the struggle in which I have been engaged. And yet I feel strengthened when I gaze upon your sweet face, and feel that I have you to live for. What as I to do? Inclination says, 'Retire from this weary world, its struggles and its trials'; and Duty answers, 'That would be cowardly. Live for your child,'Oh, I cannot, live. The world frowns upon me, and desires me out of it. Ranald Murray, since we are unlikely again to meet on earth, surely you will recognize me if we meet in heaven! Surely if you knew that, even after all yon have caused me to, suffer, I love you still, you would seesarch me out, and speak to mee kindly word ere I leave this earth. I love him still. I cannot, will not, believe that ne basely purposed from the beginning to raim me—nothing more. No, he at one time loved me truly as I loved him. Long have I wandered after him—not to upbraid, but to show how truly I love him—but I have found him not.

"And I shudder, too, as I think of the suffering my conduct, unexplained as it was, must have cest my parents—a kind father and a still kinder mother. I was as the apple of their eye—they looked on me as a priceless pearl. God knows I did nothing which should have caused them sorrow, but they knew it not. It is hard to
