The Sid is an artist—she is a woman—she is an American. This interfedic character works in the following manner: The first makes here go into strange places the second makes here enjoy new experiences, and the third makes her succeed in all the attempts. Now, in speaking of as a "little sound." Side is undoubtedly a little woman. Side is undoubtedly a little woman work of the same age and thought 30 was very old. I done that my children, appear a being of the same age and y grandmother, if not, indeed, a little older, "Old," therefore, is a purely comparative state, depending upon the point of view of the speaker. Therefore, before setting out for the Sahara, the Sid waited upon the Governor-General of Algeria and asked him to favor her project. The great man had heard of the little woman, and had refused to give her a letter of recommendation until he should see her. But when he saw her he gave it at once. That is always the way with the Sid. She gets whatever she wants. She says it is because she is such an insignificant little old woman it is not worth while refusing her anything. Perhaps so. At the same time, other insignificant little old women, when they ask favors, had better combine those qualifications with the Sid's winning manner, with her fascinating power of conversation, and, above all, with her artistic talent lest they be refused what they ask.

The Sid's letter from the Governor-General entitled her to food and lodging at the forts, and solicited kind treatment of her from the commanding officers of the garrisons where she might stop. She presented it first at Geryville, and asked for a guide to Aflon. Geryville is 130 miles southeast of Algiers, and Aflon is six day's ride from Geryville, and is, moreover, on the road to Ghardaia, Laghouat, and Ouargla, which are in the desert, and very far away from the road of the ordinary traveler. A stately Arab soldier, tall, grave, and handsome, was presented to the Sid.

Consecuson is made of flour and water. The right hand of the maker is dipped in water and the left hand is dipped into flour; the palms are then rubbed together, and pellets of dough (and dirt) are evolved. These pellets, being dried in the sun, are ready for cooking, which is usually done by placing a dish of them over the pot in which meat is being boiled.
